Mr. NEWLANDS. Congress is finally to determine it.

A FULL INVESTIGATION IS NEEDED.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Yes; Congress is finally to determine it; but Congress has already determined it with as much finality as it well can be maintained upon any measure.

Mr. President, the Senator was a little curious to know what has gotten over the Senate that his amendment had been turned down after the Senate put it on. I have explained the circumstances under which it went on the bill. I do not know who can explain; I am sure the Senator from Nevada can not; but I should like for somebody to explain, though I think I have worked out the solution, why it is that the Potomac Light & Power Co. are so much interested in having the amendment of the Senator from Nevada adopted.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state, Mr. President, that I have no knowledge upon that subject.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I did not think you had. I did not think that the Senator could be influenced by anything of that sort.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator had——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. But they are about this Capitol saying that this amendment of the Senator's ought to be adopted and that this measure ought not to be passed in its present form.

Mr. NEWLANDS. They are doing a very creditable thing, then.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I hope there was some other motive. I hope the balance of your emissaries are more devoted to the public welfare than the Potomac Light & Power Co.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will say to the Senator if he has any information to present to the Senate on that subject——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not intend to, but I have it on authority which can not be doubted. One of them, Mr. King, appeared before the committee and antagonized this proposition of building a central power plant here.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I presume he did. Therefore the Senator develops the octopus, as is usual——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Yes; when the octopus puts out its claws we had better arrest it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And describes the octopus as enveloping with its tentacles the Senate and Members of Congress, thus controlling their activities. We know that in legislative bodies of less dignity than this body that device is often resorted to, with a view of casting discredit upon very reputable movements——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is no device. It is a fact. The Potomac Electric Power Co. has been around this Capitol soliciting opposition to establishing any plant here at all and favoring the adoption of the Senator's amendment. That is the fact I am bringing out, and I would a great deal rather the Senator would be cooperating with them than to be in cooperation with them myself, though I do not mean to intimate that they exert—for I know they could not—any influence of an improper kind on the Senator from Nevada. I believe that he is actuated by nothing but honest convictions and patriotic purposes, but what motives are actuating the Potomac Power Co.? Is that patriotism on their part, I ask?

THE POTOMAC LIGHT & POWER CO.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, so far as the Potomac Power Co. is concerned, it is perfectly evident that nothing it could do would have any effect, for this reason: I have never known a single man who wishes the action which I contemplate taken who does not insist upon it that there should be a central power plant, and that the central power plant should mean the supply of more public buildings than the proposed power plant. We therefore advise a course that will diminish instead of increasing the patronage of the Potomac power plant. This is a bogy man that has been raised in order to intimidate or alarm the legislative judgment.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Oh, no; nothing——

Mr. NEWLANDS. There is nothing in it. There is not a man on this art commission who has not declared that a better central plant should be established, one more comprehensive than the one under consideration. Mr. Jennings, the vice chairman of the American Federation of Art, has presented in a very excellent letter a suggestion which embraces not only the purpose contemplated by the proposed structure, but the addition of the Government Printing Office and the navy yard, which are the largest consumers of heat and power in the District of Columbia.

A BETTER SOLUTION SOUGHT FOR.

So this movement, if successful, aided by the most skilled engineers in the country, who testified before the Committee on the Library, means a larger plant and a more complete obliteration of the 17 chimneys to which the Senator refers. All of them are intent upon a larger and more effective plant, contending that on investigation this plan would not come up to the modern scientific requirements of the times. One of the engineers testified before the Committee on the Library that this question of a central plant was one which involved the best talent of the world. He testified that in London they were contemplating the creation of a central plant that would involve the absolute obliteration of property over there worth $80,000,000 to-day. He referred to it as a gigantic problem that ought to have the best talent and the best judgment and the best experience. No one will contend that the men who have thus far carried on this thing have had the experience and opportunity of the distinguished men who appeared before the Committee on the Library.

The vice president of the New York Central Railroad, a great mechanical engineer, who has had charge of enormous development at the station there, a development costing twenty-five or thirty million dollars, and under whose jurisdiction an enormous power plant was erected, was giving his experience with reference to it; and thus the Committee on the Library sought the aid of talent that will enlarge governmental activities in the production of heat and power rather than diminish them.

I must complain of the Senator in his attitude toward a brother Senator when he would on the floor of the Senate give currency to statements reflecting upon those who favor this measure. Though the Senator denies he intends to reflect upon me, he is giving currency to statements that are intended to cast doubt upon the integrity and sincerity of motive of those who favor this plan.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I am sure no one in the sound of my voice could construe my remarks as making any intimation whatever against the sincerity of purpose or the integrity of the Senator from Nevada. On the contrary, I said several times that I believe he is actuated by nothing but patriotic motives. I believe he is the last man who would be approached by the selfish interests of the Potomac Power Co., but I do think——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I say, I never heard of them in this controversy at all.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Exactly. I did not suppose they had been to the Senator, but they have been around this Capitol. I know that. They have been before the committee and they have been to Senators privately giving advice. They claim to be actuated by very patriotic motives, but I do not look to them for patriotic motives in a case of that sort.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have inquired about it recently to find to what extent the Potomac Electric & Power Co. has been active in this matter. It is a company, of course, regarded as an octopus, but it is under the control of the District Commissioners. They can fix its rates at anything they choose. So you can imagine how much independent power it has. It has been, I understand, endeavoring to persuade the Appropriations Committee that it could furnish this heat cheaper than the Appropriations Committee could secure it for itself. This is information that has come to me since I inaugurated this resolution, and simply upon inquiry. It seems to me that is a legitimate effort to retain business. It is ineffective, it is true, but it is simply a mere business matter which should not be brought up here with a view to discrediting anybody or anyone in connection with it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am just making use of it as an argument why we ought to act on this matter. Let them get all the business they can, but I did not need their advice. I am not asking for any assistance or any information. I can get this information from other people without getting it from those directly interested in the passage of a law, who will make money out of it if it is decided one way and lose money out of it if it is decided the other way.

Mr. President, I have traced this proposition through the second committee appointed by MacVeagh, and I will say, in respect to this report of MacVeagh's, that when the committee of three made their report the President and his Cabinet considered it and adopted a resolution of thanks for the exhaustive, comprehensive, and splendid plan that they had presented. So it seems that this location and these plans have been approved by some other President before they got to President Wilson.

The second MacVeagh report was made—I will not take the time to read it—but they give their reasons, and elaborate reasons and most cogent and logical and forceful reasons, why this plant should be located and why it should be located where it has been located. They give reasons that can not be answered, they are sound and logical, and they come from disinterested and patriotic sources.

After the second report was made this is the law that was passed:

> The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to have constructed, under the direction of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, upon the land and wharf property of the United States hereinafter described, a central heating, lighting, and power plant, to furnish heat, light, and power for the buildings, old and new, of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing—

And so on, giving a long list of buildings to be supplied with heat, light, and power from this central plant, and it fixes the limit of cost.

> The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to enter into contracts to the full limit of cost hereby fixed.

Is there any man on the floor of the Senate who has a law license who will get up and say a contract entered into in pursuance of this law is invalid, and invalid because it was not referred to the Art Commission, who make no complaint of the plan, but only complain of the location and say they have had nothing to do with the location anyway? Is there anyone who would contend that even if the Executive order embraced this subject it could override an act of Congress passed by both Houses and signed by the President? I say, is there any man on the floor of the Senate who ever had a law license who will get up here and tell the Senate he believes a contract entered into in pursuance of this law is invalid because the Art Commission was not consulted in advance, and when consulted afterwards made no objection except as to the locality, and they said they had nothing to do with locating the plant?

A contract was entered into after the most exhaustive examination extending through a number of years, commencing in 1904 and ending in 1913. There were three different examinations besides those by the experts of the Treasury Department. A distinguished firm of New York engineers was engaged to assist in the work, and plans were gotten up and a contract was entered into under which they were to receive one million four hundred and odd thousand dollars for the construction of this plant.

Now, this contractor has entered upon his work. He has made a valid contract, a contract that was approved by the Secretary of the Treasury and signed by him with the advice of the legal officer of his department, a contract which to-day has the approval of the President of the United States as well as the Secretary of the Treasury, a contract made strictly in pursuance of the law passed by both Houses of Congress and signed by the President, and in pursuance of that contract they went to work.

It is true, as the Senator from Nevada says, that the excavation which he has made perhaps has not cost more than $10,000, but he has bought material, he has let out most of the work to subcontractors, and we are told that after all those precautions, after all these investigations, after a thoroughly satisfactory solution of this matter to most people, we are to do what? Annul that contract. But the Senator——

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; suspend it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I know what the Senator is going to say. I am coming to that. What is the good to suspend it unless they mean to change it, or why suspend it except with a view of changing it? Nobody is complaining of the plan and wants it changed, but they want to change the location. They want to change from this very suitable place. There are Senators here who have been there. I have been there in person. I walked around and looked at it, and I went on the high buildings and looked out from the elevation. I do not claim to be an artist. There are very few artists in the Senate. My friend from Nevada is an artist, and I say it in good faith. He has a high development of artistic taste. I have very little, but I have a practical turn. I can tell something about a suitable location for a smokestack when I look at it. I have been there and looked at it, and it is one of the best places for those smokestacks within 50 miles of Washington. You can not get one close enough to do service that is not free from objection.

I say to you, Senators, if you have any doubt about it go there and look at it, and unless you are an artist you will be satisfied with it. If you are an artist, I will not vouch for any opinion about it. I do not believe practical men can go there and look at that location and look at the plans of the building that is to be put there and find any fault with it. But, in the name of goodness, do not take it away from that isolated and proper place and put it over within three squares of this Capitol and within two squares of the House Office Building, so that you will have to breathe the black smoke that these smokestacks put out. I do not want any of it in mine. I do not want it brought within three blocks of this Capitol. I do not believe that is a fit place for smokestacks. I do not think any smokestacks ought ever to have been put in Garfield Park. Instead of trying to remove these smokestacks from the banks of the Potomac, the other side of the railroad, near the fish market, put a little art into Garfield Park and take away some of the smokestacks that are belching out smoke there; but, for the Lord's sake, do not put two or four more, as the case may be, within two blocks of the House Office Building and within three blocks of the Capitol.

Mr. President, I may be entirely wrong, but it was, I think, unfortunate when these people suggested Garfield Park as a substitute for Water Street and Fourteenth Street. I do not think the average Senator here wants to breathe that black smoke, even the little of it that will escape the smoke condenser. There will be some. They never have found a plan that will entirely eliminate smoke. They alleviate it very much, but what little they do not alleviate would be absolutely harmless down on the banks of the Potomac River. The banks of the Potomac River will really be beautified by a splendid building which is going to be erected and by two beautiful smokestacks.

Now, Mr. President, I believe I have consumed about as much of the time of the Senate as I am justified in consuming. I will call attention to the fact that this new plant is a mile and a third from the White House. Do you not think that that is a pretty good distance? Do you think anyone is going to be hurt up at the White House a mile and a third away? It is just 1 mile from the Lincoln Memorial. Do you think the Lincoln Memorial will be hurt by these smokestacks a mile off? Would you not rather have it a mile from Lincoln Memorial than to have it three blocks from the Capitol of the United States? It is three-quarters of a mile from the Washington Monument. It is two blocks from the fish market. It is right bad to have a fish market that near the power plant. I do not think the power plant will hurt the fish market, but I do think that it is a pity that the fish market is so near. If anything is obnoxious down there it is the fish market, but we can not give up fish, and we can not have fish unless there is a market to which they are brought. That locality down on the banks of the Potomac was dedicated years ago to purposes of that sort—a fish market, lumber yards, railroad embankments, a power house.

Now, another thing, Mr. President: I have conceded that my friend from Nevada is an artist, but I am not exactly prepared to concede that he is an engineer. I understand you can not transmit steam heat from Garfield Park to many of the buildings that are going to be supplied from the central power plant. The experts at the Treasury Department say it can not be done except at a very expensive loss of heat. Some of the buildings are within a fraction of 4 miles from the Garfield Park plant. I talked with Mr. Elliott Woods. He was very careful, because he did not like to put his mouth into other people's affairs, so I could not get much out of him. He was not prepared to say it could not be done. He said he would not be responsible for the statement that it could not be done.

Mr. ROBINSON. In this connection will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will.

Mr. ROBINSON. The statement was made on the floor of the Senate this morning that by locating this plant where the Garfield power plant is now located and combining the two an annual saving of $50,000 in operating expenses would be made. Is the Senator prepared to make any statement in connection with that?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not think it is correct. The power plant where it is proposed to be put will save $175,000, and when one or two other buildings are finally supplied by it it will save $85,000 more. Those figures have been worked out by the engineers of the Treasury Department. I think, to be accurate, $177,000 will be saved as soon as this plant is put in operation, and when two other buildings that are in contemplation are erected and supplied with heat and power, as they can be from this central plant, there will be $85,000 more saved, $40,000 on one and $45,000 on the other. There is a great economy in having a central power plant to supply the Government buildings in the different parts of the District.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Virginia a question. The statement just made is made in contemplation of the removal of the existing plants in the existing buildings, is it not?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We had a gentleman from the Treasury Department before the Committee on the Library, and I asked him the question as to whether these other plants would be removed or not. He did not commit himself to that proposition. He said they might be kept there to be used in case of emergency. Now, if they are to be kept to be used in case of emergency there are 17 smokestacks that will have to be kept, and their overhead charges will have to be kept, and the personnel employed in them will have to be kept. I ask the Senator the question, because there may have been before the committee some evidence upon that subject justifying him in the conclusion that they would be removed.

A QUESTION OF ECONOMY.

This gentleman was talking about the saving, and laying it upon the removal of the other plants. So I asked him the question whether it would be saved or not, accompanying it with the assertion, on my part, that hitherto I had found when you made a new appropriation in Washington for some purpose, and they told you that it would save expense because you did away with something else, they managed to keep both, to wit, one of them a new building, the other an old one. They said they were going to save renting everywhere, but they manage somehow to keep on renting, just as much as they ever did, and still they fill up the new building. So in connection with what the Senator has just said I should like to have him state the reason for his conclusion that they will dismantle these plants and discharge the personnel and do away with the overhead charges.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I understand that is positively the purpose. They told me these 17 smokestacks would be removed and the operation of those plants would be discontinued where they are, and the heat and light would be supplied from the central power plant as soon as it could be completed. Those are the statements that have been made to me. I have relied on them and I still rely on them. I know of no reason to doubt it whatever.

Now, Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator will admit, however, that if a heat and power plant of even a larger capacity is erected at the central point it will also result in the destruction of these 17 smokestacks and also of some others, will it not, that are not covered by the proposed plan?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The answer to that is that I know of no place where such a plant can be erected without doing infinitely more harm to the beauty and comfort of the city of Washington than the one proposed. This contract has been made; the Government is not only liable, and it ought to make it good, but its good faith ought to be protected.

There may, of course, be alterations in this as there are in almost every building that is constructed; but anyone who has ever put up a building knows that if there be a door changed or the size of a window changed it means a very large extra charge. Builders do not make changes and alterations without charging very heavily for them. If we postpone the execution of this contract, there are damages to start with; but I say there is no need for postponing the execution of the contract; on the contrary, there is every reason for urging this power plant and hastening it as fast as possible. It has had every investigation that can be made. It has been considered from every point of view; it has been approved time and again successively by different committees and different experts from 1904 down to this time.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question. If this contract is postponed and ultimately vacated and a building on different plans erected in some other place, would it not require a new letting of the contract?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Beyond a doubt it would.

Mr. STONE. Would it not open it again?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Beyond a doubt it would.

Mr. STONE. And if the present contractor fails to obtain the contract, particularly in that event, possibly without that event, in estimating his damages, setting aside his contract, would not a reasonable profit to be realized on the contract be estimated as a part of the loss?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. As a lawyer I think beyond a doubt, and I am sure the Senator from Missouri has not a doubt, that he would be entitled to damages equal to what he would have made on his contract if it had not been vacated. It is a valid and binding contract, and he is entitled to all the profits he can get out of it under the terms of the contract, and if we vacate the contract he is entitled in the way of damages to the same amount of profits that he would have made, and any honest jury or intelligent court would give it to him.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Assuming that no amicable arrangement could be made with the present contractor by which this building would be put up on another site and he would lose his contract, assuming the very worst, I ask the Senator whether in his judgment he thinks damages would amount to more than 10 per cent of the entire contract, which would make $150,000 on a million and a half?

Mr. MARTIN of Virgina. I believe it would amount to more than that. I believe the contractors make more than 10 per cent.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does the Senator think it would amount to $200,000?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am not prepared to say; I am not an expert; but they expend a lot of money.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I say, as a matter of fact, this will be an impairment of the beauty of the general plan of Washington; and if, as a matter of fact, it will have to come down one of these days, does not the Senator think it would be wiser to submit to a loss of $150,000 or $200,000 now rather than submit to a loss of $1,500,000 in the future?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not anticipate the last alternative at all. We have made a contract; we ought to carry it out in good faith; and we will be doing the country good service when we do carry it out in good faith.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia and I have served a long time on the Committee on the District of Columbia and have had to do with a great many matters in connection with the location of public buildings, and that sort of thing. The Senator from Virginia will recall the fact that it is an easy matter to talk about finding a location in the District of Columbia on which to put up a public building, but a mighty difficult matter to find it when you go in search of it. As an illustration, we wanted to establish a reformatory, and we had to go over to the Senator's State and get a site; we very much want a garbage plant, and we are inhibited from putting it up in the District of Columbia because there is not sufficient acreage here available. We are now importuning Virginia to let us go over there and establish our garbage plant. So in connection with other matters of this kind. Of course this building has got to be within a reasonable distance of the buildings that it is going to serve. Now, deny Congress the right to erect this building on the site that has been selected, and I should like to know where another site is to be found.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The only one proposed is the site of the Capitol power plant over in Garfield Park.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator knows that is not a reasonable thing to anticipate.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I fully entertain that opinion, but that is what they are recommending to us as an alternative.

Mr. GALLINGER. The plant which is now in Garfield Park ought never to have been put there, and it would be an outrage to put another great plant in that park, which ought to be reserved for a playground. There was a great protest against it when it was located there. I did what I could to prevent it going there, but it went there. Do not let us accentuate the wrong we then did by putting another great plant two squares from the beautiful House Office Building, three squares from the Capitol, and three and a half squares from the Senate Office Building.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator permit me to say a word right here?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will when the Senator from New Hampshire is through.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am not going to take much time. I should like Senators who are talking about changing this site, who are talking about destroying this contract, and who say that it is only $150,000 or, at most, $300,000 that we will have to pay, as though that were a bagatelle, to go out and search for a site which would be better or as good as the one which has been selected by Congress, indorsed by the committee, and by the Senator from Nevada's own witness, the President of the United States. We sought for months and months to get a site for an Eastern High School Building and finally located it away down almost on the eastern bank of the Anacostia River, that being the only available site for a high-school building in the eastern part of the city. It is not an easy matter, but it is a very difficult matter, to find a new site, even if there were one somewhere as available as is this, but there is not one. I feel sure the Senator from Nevada, if he will personally investigate the matter, will come to the same conclusion that I have.

Mr. President, just one word more. I do not think the Potomac Electric Light Co. has had much to do with this matter. They have not been to me. Yesterday evening when I was called from my bed at 9.30 o'clock, to read a letter on the side of this controversy advocated by the Senator from Nevada, having been bombarded during the entire day by letters from men who say they know all about this subject, I almost came to the conclusion that the lobby committee ought to be at work; but that does not affect me and it does not affect anybody else. Doubtless the Potomac Electric Light Co. would like to furnish this light. My own impression has always been that they could have furnished it to us at a much cheaper price, if we should reckon interest on the plant that we have in Garfield Park, than we are now paying for it; but that was not the judgment of Congress. I am in favor of the location of this plant on the banks of the Potomac River, where it is in contemplation to locate it, and I trust that, if any Senator has any doubt about it, he will do as some of us have done—go there and make a personal inspection of the site; and I feel sure he will be persuaded that the aesthetic argument that has been used ought not to be given much weight.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator from Virginia permit me just a moment to say a word to do away with a misapprehension?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not understand that the Commission of Fine Arts have at any time advocated that the Capitol plant should be taken. The idea of taking that plant has been developed by Mr. Jennings, who has absolutely demonstrated that it is nearer the center of gravity than is the other plant. The question is not simply one of alternatives; the question is, first, as to whether a better site can be secured; and, second, whether the building itself can be so designed as to be attractive. The building has been condemned as inartistic in that place. The question, therefore, is not as between two locations, but the question is as to whether the best desirable location can be secured other than these two, if there be one. We say inquiry has not been exhausted on that subject.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I omitted to say, Mr. President, that this location has one immense advantage in its convenience to both water and rail to get a supply of coal. It is an immense cost to haul coal from the wharves and depots to places like Garfield Park, for instance.

I will say, in response to what the Senator from Nevada has just said, that a great many of these art people have been to see me, and I have invariably asked them, "What have you to suggest? What better can be done?" All of them have said, "Garfield Park." There is nothing in competition with the location which has been fixed upon except Garfield Park; and nothing could be worse than Garfield Park, and nothing could be better than the location which has been made.

Mr. President, I simply want to say that this is a very important matter. The committee having charge of it has given it careful investigation and all the thought they were capable of giving it. They have reached a conclusion after having heard everybody who desired to be heard. My committee room has been sometimes full of these art agitators. I do not speak of them disparagingly, but they have hammered all their views at me as strongly as they could. I may be at fault, but all I can give the Senate is my best capacity and the fullest industry in the investigation of these matters, and I have given them in the consideration of this subject. I have reached a conclusion not only from the testimony of those who have been to see me and the experts of the Treasury Department, but I have visited in person and scrutinized every inch of the premises as carefully as I could. We have made a report to you after those investigations, and we have asked you to adopt the conference report. This is the only item that is in those agreed upon which has invited any opposition whatever, and I should immensely dislike to see it go back to conference, for when it goes back it will be further from a solution than ever.

We have done all that is practicable; we have done all that we could do; we have done that which thoroughly satisfies us; and I ask the Senate to adopt the conference report which has been submitted.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, before the Senator from Virginia takes his seat, I want to call his attention to another amendment—Senate amendment numbered 16, on page 28 of the bill, and to the conference report relating to that particular amendment. It appears that the conference report modifies the amendment in this respect: The original amendment authorized the employment of a superintendent of national parks in the District of Columbia and four other competent persons.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that I used every effort in my power to retain that amendment, but I did not think that I would be justified in insisting on it to the extent of jeopardizing the bill. I, however, submitted to a modification of the Senate amendment, so as to provide for a transfer of the superintendent of the parks of the Capital without a provision for clerks. I have no doubt they will find some way to overcome that difficulty.

You have heard about the man who was having an old man prayed out of purgatory, and the priest told him "He has got his head out"; he wanted 10 cents more, and then said "He has got his arms out"; and then he wanted 10 cents more. Finally the man got a little tired, and he said "If the old man is that near out, I guess he will jump out." I think the people who advocate this change will jump out. I think the amendment is very meritorious. I was very sorry it was disagreed to, but I could not hold it all in, and I thought, if I got that much, you could jump out.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator's illustration touches a subject that I know absolutely nothing about, and that I hope the Senator is not and never will be very familiar with; but I particularly wanted to ask the Senator from Virginia whether it was the intention of the amendment as modified to prevent the employment of clerks in addition to the superintendent of parks?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I take it that clerks will be transferred and that the department will get them. They are obliged to have clerks.

Mr. ROBINSON. That was the particular point to which I wanted to address my suggestion. The evidence upon which the committee acted in inserting the amendment showed that it was necessary, in addition to the superintendent, to have certain clerks; and I think the Senator from Virginia will agree with me that in inserting the amendment the committee limited the clerks to the smallest margin to which, under the evidence, we thought the number should be limited.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will say to the Senator that he knows that the regular appropriation bill will soon be along, and I hope that we shall be able to take care of them on that bill. I think the department will find some way to live under this provision until that time. As I have stated, I was very anxious to retain the provision, but could not do it.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am satisfied—and I believe the Senator from Virginia agrees with me in the construction of the amendment as modified by the conference committee—that it would be necessary to evade the law in some way in order to secure the clerks that are required.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I would not say that it would be necessary to evade the law, but they will find some way under the law to supply the clerks.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Secretary of the Interior thinks that would be very difficult, if not impossible, to do.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If it is impossible to do it, we shall have to tackle it when the next appropriation bill comes along.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Virginia is convinced that it is impracticable under the present condition to make any further changes in that view?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I struggled with it as long as I thought there was any hope.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is what I wanted to ascertain.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I was very tenacious about it.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have been much interested in the amendment, the same as has the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. In my judgment this change in the amendment only alters the situation so that the clerks can not be used a part of the year in the western country and the other part of the year in Washington; but it does not inhibit in any way, I think, the employment of the necessary clerks here in Washington, the superintendent, or the employment of special agents in the field. It merely does not permit what we undertook to permit, namely, that those particular clerks could work at both places in different parts of the field.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator thinks that the necessary clerks could be employed under the language "and other necessary expenses in connection with the administration of the national parks"?

Mr. WARREN. There will be no trouble at all. We do not now appropriate especially for them. The necessary clerks can be taken from the general Interior Department.

Mr. ROBINSON. In view of the statement of the Senator from Virginia, I do not desire further to delay the conference report.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. We made the best effort we could, and we will stand with you to rectify the difficulty in the future—at any rate I will—and I think it ought to have been done now.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hardwick	Newlands	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Hollis	Oliver	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Hughes	Overman	Smoot
Broussard	Husting	Page	Stone
Bryan	Johnson, S. Dak.	Phelan	Sutherland
Catron	Jones	Pittman	Swanson
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Poindexter	Thomas
Clapp	Kern	Pomerene	Thompson
Clark, Wyo.	La Follette	Ransdell	Tillman
Clarke, Ark.	Lane	Reed	Underwood
Colt	Lodge	Robinson	Vardaman
Curtis	McCumber	Shafroth	Walsh
du Pont	McLean	Sheppard	Warren
Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Sherman	Weeks
Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Shields	Williams
Gronna	Myers	Simmons	Works
Harding	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. HOLLIS. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] on official business.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am requested to announce that the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] is absent on official business.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I should like to repeat the announcement which I made earlier in the day as to the absence of my colleague [Mr. ASHURST], and for the same reasons.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to inquire whether there are any other Senators who wish to speak regarding this heat and light plant? If there are, I will defer my remarks until later. As there is no response, I will now proceed.

Mr. President, I presume this matter of the conference report will be submitted in a few moments to the Senate, and I will only take a short time in answering the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

In the first place, I call your attention to the nature of the amendment. It is an amendment to an original appropriation of $600,000 made by the House and enlarged by the action of the Senate so as to provide for a total increase of the cost of the plant from $1,494,000 to $1,669,000, to which amendment, reported by the Senate committee, was added in the Senate the following proviso:

Provided, That no work upon the construction of said plant shall be commenced until the plans therefor shall have been submitted to the National Fine Arts Commission for their approval, and approved by the President of the United States.

You will see therefore that no question of choice between two locations is now to be determined; no question of the artistic appearance of the building is now to be determined. All that we propose to do by adhering to this proviso, which has been stricken out in conference, is to provide for the suspension of the work until the President, with the aid of the Commission of Fine Arts, shall have looked into this matter and signified his approval.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to say just a word?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The proviso stated that the work should not proceed until the plans had been submitted to the Fine Arts Commission and until the President approved.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Both have now been done. The plans have been submitted to the Fine Arts Commission and the President has approved them.

AN INQUIRY BY EXPERTS NEEDED.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But, Mr. President, it has not been such an inquiry of experts as would be accomplished by the adoption of the proviso, for doubtless the best talent of the country would be provided in connection with the Commission of Fine Arts in determining the question as to how large this plant should be to meet every Government requirement and where it should be located, as well as the architectural appearance of the building itself. Such investigation as has been made under the pressure of this legislation is not the deliberate investigation, proceeding on inquiry and information, that we desire. It has simply been an investigation with a view to a quick and not a deliberate determination of the matter, and with a view to affecting the action of Congress itself upon a matter which will require the deliberate, and not the hasty, judgment of our officials.

Mr. President, I have received just now a telegram from Daniel C. French, the honorary president of the National Sculpture Society, the sculptor who has been chosen for the Lincoln Memorial, formerly the president of the Fine Arts Commission, and an honored member of that commission, having recently resigned in order to take up the work of the Lincoln Memorial. I will read his telegram. It is true that in it he refers to a structure of four smokestacks, instead of two, but it will be recalled that the plans involve the present construction of two and the ultimate construction of four smokestacks. He says:

Senator FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS,
Washington, D. C.:

I beg to protest against the erection of the four smokestacks as proposed in Potomac Park. I consider it a calamity.

DANIEL C. FRENCH,
Honorary President National Sculpture Society.

THE LOCATION.

Now, Mr. President, with reference to the location. The Senator suggests that it is simply a choice between two sites; but I want to impress upon the minds of the Senate that the field of inquiry is to be open. Simply in response to the insistence of the Treasury officials that this was the only available site, Mr. Jennings, the vice chairman of the American Federation of Arts, and himself a skilled engineer, after making investigation, declares that the existing plant in Garfield Park is nearer the center of gravity than the proposed plant, and that from it you could supply the two greatest consumers of power and heat in the District of Columbia, namely, the Government Printing Office and the navy yard, whereas the proposed plant does not contemplate supplying either. It was merely in that view, to show that there was an alternative plan, contemplating the enlargement of the plant now existing—a nuisance already created, if it is a nuisance—and that that plant would be preferable, more economical, and would result in a greater saving to the Government than the proposed plant, and it would not have the disadvantage of interfering with the proposed plans of the Park Commission.

THE WATER FRONT.

In the second place, the Senator dwells upon this particular commercial water front. He declares that you only have to look at it to determine that the proposed plant would be an ornament rather than an injury, and he refers contemptuously to the fact that there is to be on that water front a fish market. I hope there will be a fish market there, and I hope there will be many other useful things; but I also hope they will be designed by architects who will design them in such a way that they will fit into the landscape.

I have already referred to the fact that the Burnham plans contemplate what is called a Potomac quay, where there is a beautiful raised roadway, an esplanade upon which you can look down upon all the useful things, such as the fish market and the other activities of commerce, the esplanade itself being a beautiful creation, in the expectation that the architecture of every building constructed near that quay and of every wharf reaching out into the river will be of such form and proportions as to commend it to the eye and to add to the beauty of the scene instead of detracting from it. I refer Senators to the map which I have before me and which they have before them, an arrow pointing to this particular commercial water front, involving a stretch of about a mile or more between the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and the War College, which contains the legend:

The commercial water front owned by the Government and in course of harmonious development. It is to form a boulevard connection between Potomac Park and the War College, and is also the water approach to Washington from the South.

I will ask the privilege of inserting in the RECORD various things to which I have referred in the course of my argument. I ask unanimous consent that they may be inserted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator what the request was?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have asked permission to insert in the RECORD various things to which I have referred.

Mr. SMOOT. Not in the way of diagrams or pictures?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Oh, no; no diagrams.

I close this matter, so far as I am concerned, by stating that I regard this as a most important matter, involving the judgment of Congress, which took the initiative on this subject by initiating the inquiry and initiating the legislation through the Committee on Appropriations and which certainly has a right to revise its opinion and to change its mind, and which in this amendment simply seeks to suspend the work until an expert inquiry can be made.

THE SOURCE AND NATURE OF THE PROTESTS.

Sneering allusion has been made in the correspondence with the Treasury Department and sneering allusion has been made upon the floor to the influences that are at work to prevent what the artists of the country regard as a barbarism. One of the Senators even suggested that it is a case where the lobby committee should be called into the exercise of its powers. The people who are associated with this agitation are connected with the great architectural and art associations and engineering associations of the country. Every one of them is protesting against this thing. The American Institute of Architects, the American Federation of Arts, the American Association of Engineers, and the American Association of Consulting Engineers are protesting against it.

THE OPPOSITION OF THE ENGINEERS.

As one distinguished engineer said before the Library Committee, the engineers are learning something by experience. He said that whereas they used to determine all these questions as matters of mathematics and economics, they are learning the value of calling in the artists in collaboration with them, and they are pursuing that course more and more, because their works thus planned present a very much better appearance to the eye, give future generations some idea of the culture of the time, and often result, through the suggestions of these architects—who are also great constructors and administrators—in means of economy in the practical work itself.

There was a time in the history of the country when legislators were disposed to regard the artists with as much contempt as they did "these literary fellows" to whom frequent allusions were in those times made in legislative bodies. That time has gone by. This country is realizing that the only permanent evidence to future generations of the culture of any period is the literature and the arts, and that it is the highest duty of every generation to hand down to future generations some evidence of the culture and refinement of the time.

A REVIVAL OF TASTE.

This period existed in the early days of the Republic, when the mansions of the Virginia gentlemen graced the hills and mountains of Virginia. It has had a revival during the past 25 years in the various expositions that have been created—the exposition at Chicago, the exposition at St. Louis, and the exposition at San Francisco, the latter crowning them all in excellence. People are realizing the satisfaction which beauty gives in the common affairs of life, and their realization of this fact is increasing more and more. The artists and engineers, the professional men of creative imagination, and the professional men of mathematics and practical affairs, unite in asking us to suspend this work until competent judgment can be secured.

I have no wish to decry the judgment that has already been utilized by the Congress of the United States in this matter. I have great respect for Mr. Green, the former custodian of the Library; but certainly no one will claim that he ranks among the great mechanical engineers of the country or that he ranks with those men who, in the great cities, have reached eminence and distinction in that specialty. No one will claim that an engineer in the office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, receiving a salary of $3,000 a year, whose judgment is invoked with reference to these plans and whose judgment has been followed in the main by the Supervising Architect's Office, however worthy and however intelligent he may be, will rank with the great men of distinction in that profession.

THE LOCATION NOT APPROVED BY THE ENGINEERS.

There was one man of great distinction who was consulted at the instance of the Secretary of the Treasury, and that was Mr. Stillwell, of New York. His testimony appears before the Committee on the Library. He was very delicate about making any statement at all with regard to himself. He regarded the Treasury Department as his client, and when he appeared before the Committee on the Library he stated his situation and said he did not wish to make any statement without the sanction of the Treasury Department. I called up the Secretary of the Treasury and put the case to him. He said that of course Mr. Stillwell had been employed by the Government and was entitled to speak his mind, and thereupon he did.

The first statement he made was that when he came down here, shortly after his retainer by the Treasury Department, he asked whether a sufficient inquiry had been made regarding the site. He was inclined to regard it with disfavor, and he suggested that there should be a thorough inquiry regarding that matter. He was informed that that question was foreclosed. It was foreclosed, not by the action of the Treasury Department, but by the action of Congress. The Treasury Department seems to regard itself as under indictment regarding these matters. The selection of that site was the act of Congress, and we accept full responsibility for it. The only question is whether we have not a right to change or modify our mind and whether the Treasury Department should be potential in obstructing our change of mind with reference to a matter upon which we acted.

Mr. Stillwell made these preliminary statements. I will read briefly from his testimony:

Senator NEWLANDS. I did not know but that this inquiry may have suggested something to you. Mr. Stillwell, would you deem it a wise thing, as a mechanical engineer and a man of experience in these matters, to have at this time a broad and comprehensive survey made of this question of supplying the Government buildings with heat and light?

Mr. STILLWELL. Senator, I have no hesitation in answering that question in the affirmative, because I had made that suggestion some time ago to the officials of the Treasury Department. An engineer perhaps is like other professional men, liable to exaggerate the relative importance of his specialty, but the uses of power in modern life are increasing so very rapidly that one must recognize the fact that in order to avoid great waste of money and of effort in the growth of our communities it is necessary to plan for your power development far in advance and on a comprehensive and symmetrical scale.

It would be very difficult to make a guess as to the amount of money that has been wasted or the apparatus that has been scrapped, particularly in this country, by a failure to make a broad study of such problems at the outstart. In Europe they have a number of cases, to one of which Mr. Gilbert has referred as the most striking. In that case the £16,000,000 which parliamentary inquiry determined to be necessary to amortize in some way in order to make it possible to adopt a modern method and have the whole supply come from one or two central sources did not represent all the money that had been put in, but represented the amount that could not be utilized in connection with the extensions. It was something that had to be written up in some way and charged up to something, and they did not get out of that difficulty. When the war broke out they were still going on with their 62 plants, supplying not quite 62 kinds of service but a great variety of service.

Now, in New York, Chicago, and Boston, in practically all of our large cities, at great expense the public-utilities corporations supplying the general power service have, after building many small plants here, there, and everywhere for various purposes, thrown them away and substituted new large central stations.

And, recollect, we rely now practically upon a plan that was made by Mr. Bernard Green as far back as 1904, if my recollection is correct.

Mr. Stillwell goes on and says:

So, I decidedly think that in this Capital City, where you have so comprehensive and admirable a plan for the development of the city in the future, that there should be an equally comprehensive plan for the power supply.

Then, in another place, after he had made his preliminary statement, he stated that the plans were defective in that they provided for only one line of steam pipes instead of two in the tunnels, one being relied upon to support the other in case of an emergency. In another place he said:

I should like to say at the outset that my firm has in this matter assumed no responsibility in regard to the selection of a site. We have been told that that matter was settled before we were called in; that the plant was to be located at a certain point. Our function has been limited to this.

Then he goes on:

As to the site, expressing my personal opinion of the matter—and I am glad to have an opportunity to do so—I think this whole matter has been approached here in a way that could not be expected to attain the best economical results. For instance, one of the first things that suggested itself to us when we came here was why build a new plant? Why not extend the existing plant? Of course, the present plant is farther away from the buildings which are to be heated, and it is possible that were we to figure out the losses in transmitting the steam, we might reach the conclusion that it was unwise to transmit it so far. That problem, so far as I know, has never been investigated.

It has been investigated since, and it has been demonstrated that you could take on other places to supply, and that the Capitol plant is nearer the center of gravity than the other.

Then I asked Mr. Stillwell the following question:

Would you regard that site, with reference to the Mall and the general architectural and landscape development there, as objectionable?

Mr. STILLWELL. You are asking me now as a citizen of the United States?

Senator NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. STILLWELL. I would not have the plant there, Senator. I would place it somewhere else.

THE INQUIRY TO BE CONTINUED.

Mr. President, I shall not weary the Senate with any further comments upon this matter beyond saying that the joint resolution which I originally offered, and from which this amendment originated, is still pending, and that resolution will be pressed with vigor in the future in case the action of the Senate should be adverse upon this subject. I know how difficult it is to secure the rejection of a conference report upon an appropriation bill containing many items of urgent necessity in which many Senators are interested, but I have hoped, from the interest which has been shown in this debate, that the Senate will do as any business man would do under similar circumstances when his attention is called to great architectural and engineering difficulties in connection with a proposed structure—pause for a moment, until the best expert advice can be secured. That is all my amendment to the urgent deficiency bill asks for, and as the only way of getting relief I urge the rejection of the conference report, even though it operates to delay the taking effect of the numerous appropriations in this bill.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I desire, more for the purpose of explaining my vote than anything else, to state that I believe much that is irrelevant has been drawn into this discussion.

The site in question was selected by Congress, and therefore the Treasury Department is not responsible for it. The Treasury Department is much concerned in the construction of this building, because it is estimated to save $200,000 a year in furnishing light and power and heat to the several buildings within its scope. I suppose it is the function of the Treasury Department to save money for the Nation, and I commend the zeal of the Secretary of the Treasury. At the same time my life associations have been with men of art, and I wholly sympathize with them in their desire to make the Capital of the Nation a city set upon a hill, more beautiful than any other, a model and an exemplar for the cities of the country. The fact remains that the law was not complied with, and the Arts Commission created by Congress was not consulted as to the character of this structure. Furthermore, when after the contract was let they were consulted they condemned it.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF WASHINGTON.

I have been reading here the report on the improvement of the park system of the District of Columbia, the report of the Senate committee and the report of the Park Commission, and also the article on the city of Washington by former President Taft in the Geographic Magazine of March, 1915. I find there that in the development of the city of Washington, splendidly launched by Gen. Washington himself and his engineer, L'Enfant, who in turn was advised by Thomas Jefferson, there was but one intention—to make this a monumental city, not counting the cost. I find that at a period in this development, about the time of the Civil War, I think, those ideals were lost sight of, and the Treasury Building was erected and the State, War, and Navy Department Building was erected on the line of Pennsylvania Avenue, which if projected and unobstructed would have made the city far more beautiful, and would have adhered to the original plans of L'Enfant. There are permanent structures which can not be taken down to gratify æsthetic tastes, and yet they mar the city as much in some respects as the Pension Office Building or the old Post Office Building.

Great mistakes have been made. Knowing these things and fearing the violation of a principle and the establishment of a wrong precedent, I consider it my duty to support the motion of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], in order that we may endeavor to establish the authority of the Arts Commission, and the fact that under the law and under the Executive orders they are entitled to be first consulted. I do not believe that in the development of the Capital we shall be safe unless we follow the advice of men capable of judging of these things.

The glorious creation of the Jewel City by the Golden Gate, referred to by the Senator, proves that better than anything I can say. If left, perhaps, to the local committee, saving a few dollars, they might have housed the exhibits in waterproof structures; but they wisely consulted the great architects, not of California, but of the United States—just such men as sit on the Arts Commission. As a result we had a beautiful and harmonious group of buildings.

So, as a matter of principle, and fearing that we may establish a bad precedent, I desire to support the motion of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to occupy only a few moments.

It seems to me that our minds have been led far afield from the question directly before us. We are to vote on the conference report, which must be accepted or rejected, and in case of rejection the bill must be sent back to the conference committee; and nothing is settled by the latter course except delay. It seems to me that a project that would elicit such debate and such eloquence as has been heard here to-day is one that ought to come after mature deliberation and ought to be presented in such a way that it can reach both bodies upon its merits.

This bill is the urgent deficiency bill. It contains appropriations which are exceedingly urgent regarding sanitation, health, and so forth. The bill was allowed to be amended, our good-natured chairman, patient, as he always is, being willing to accept the amendment and have the committee take it under consideration and see whether or not it could be carried out. We encountered the strenuous opposition of the other side, and, after due efforts, were compelled to recede. To take it back into conference now merely means to delay these appropriations, and to settle nothing.

What this amendment seeks has really been already complied with. The matter has been reported on by the Fine Arts Commission. It has been favorably reported on by the President as recently as to-day in his autographed letter which has been read here at the desk. I know nothing in the law that requires the Congress of the United States to make its bow to the Fine Arts Commission to the extent that such commission may absolutely veto any act of Congress, as much as we respect and revere the members of that commission.

They have done their duty; we do ours, and it seems to me that the question of the final carrying out of these plans for the beautification of Washington is something that ought to be considered apart from the urgent appropriation of moneys that are needed to-day.

I recall, and I presume many other Senators do, that the so-called McMillan Commission, of many years ago, employed artists and engineers and architects, and a plan was laid out that the parks and parking system of Washington should be extended; in fact, that we should go down to where the Metropolitan Club is, or thereabouts, take in that block, the one east of it, the one in which the Riggs Bank is located, and then strike a line from somewhere there to about were the present railroad station is, costing, for the land that would have to be condemned, a matter of some $270,000,000 or $290,000.000. Congress has not so far adopted that plan.

Now, here is a contract already made. It could be abrogated if we pay the damages. Congress, in the first place, has no right to abrogate it without paying damages, and it would not be fair to do so if we had the right. If this great scheme of elaboration which I have referred to is carried out finally in Washington, the matter then of changing this power-plant location, or doing away with it entirely, is a matter which, even at its total cost, would be exceedingly small compared with the great expenditure of these many millions of dollars mentioned. The Senator from Nevada says $150,000 would probably be the measure of damages to pay if the contract is broken.

What I think we should do, is to adopt this conference report and allow these appropriations to be unlocked and allow the several objects that are so much in the need of funds to have them, as proposed in this appropriation bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations I desire to say a word with relation to this matter. As has been shown by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] the erection of a power-and-heating plant in the city of Washington has been the subject of consideration for a long while. There has been selected at last after several years of time this site as the proper site for the erection of such power-and-heating plant. There have been plans and specifications drawn. The matter has been let to public bidding. Bids have been requested and been accepted, and a contract has been let. It seems to me that, inasmuch as no definite site is pointed out where the power plant may be erected, we are in chaos when we attempt to stop an enterprise that has been so long maturing, and we get into the air without knowing where we are going further.

The plan that has been suggested by some, and it has been denied by others, is within only two blocks of the House Building and only three blocks from the Capitol. Surely the erection of these great funnels or smokestacks would not be an ornament here, and would be much more objectionable than they would be down in the section where they have been located.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question? Does he regard the location of the power plant for the Capitol as a mistake?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I do not know that I do. I regard it as a small plant. I do not see that there has been a great deal of protest. I have never noticed any unsightly influence in that direction as marring any very great beauty in this part of the city.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That plant has two smokestacks, just as the proposed plant has. Now, does the Senator suppose that an addition of two more would be serious?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I merely want to add that the selection of that site was a mistake. Then Congress did err in its judgment with reference to that. We want to save this plan from the consequences of a similar mistake in the future by an inquiry now.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I do not think this site is a mistake. By a reference to the map it will be seen that it is in a section where there are railroad tracks, and the railroad leading across the Potomac divides this very plant from the Potomac Park. There are a number of private buildings, and they are not beautiful. If there is a section in the city of Washington where a plant of that kind would receive less protest from the people, it would be that section.

Now, when we go to the Garfield Park site, in the first place we have great protests from residents, because there are residences right around it. Then, in addition to that, it is too far from these buildings to transmit the steam that is necessary to heat them. While you could heat the Capitol Building and the Library Building and heat the Senate and the House Office Buildings, yet, as a matter of fact, when you go to the Treasury Department and to the State, War, and Navy Departments, it is too far for that purpose.

But here the contract has been let after mature deliberation. We will absolutely lose a large amount of money if we vacate that land, and consequently it seems to me it would be foolish to do so.

But, when we consider that there is no other site that is presented to us that will present near as much of the economical feature of transmitting steam, and none to which there is less objection than this plant, it seems to me that we ought to adopt this plan.

This is a proper measure that comes up; the President has approved this plan and this site, and, consequently, upon the very ground upon which the Senator asks for a reconsideration it has also been determined.

It seems to me that if this matter had come up earlier there might have been some investigation in regard to it; and even then it would not be successful on account of this trouble.

Mr. President, when we have a plan, and everybody concedes that a heating and power plant has been the desire of the United States Government for years, and here comes a proposition almost to begin the construction of it, to have it wiped out and delayed and placed in another part of the city, when new plans would have to be drawn and a new letting would also have to be made, we will not see a plant erected for two years and more. So far as marring that part of the city of Washington is concerned, being in the commercial section, being in a part of the city where there are private places that are not beautiful at all, and which probably never will be made beautiful, and being across the railroad from Potomac Park, it seems to me we ought to approve the conference report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRYAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], and I vote "yea."

Mr. CATRON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I do not know how he would vote. Therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], which I transfer to the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], and vote "yea."

Mr. GRONNA (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON]. I do not see him in the Chamber. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. I am informed that if he were present he would vote as I do. I therefore feel at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. He being absent, I transfer my pair to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). Has the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. WEEKS. I have a general pair with him, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. Being informed by his colleague [Mr. OLIVER] that if he were present he would vote as I am about to vote, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. REED. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. I am informed that he has noted voted. I therefore transfer my pair with the Senator from Arkansas to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and let my vote stand.

Mr. HOLLIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I announce again the absence of the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] on official business. I will state that he is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. If the senior Senator from New York were here he would vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. ASHURST] on important business.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] is paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]; that the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY]; that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] is paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]; and that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON].

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—44.

So the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate further insist on its amendments still in disagreement and ask a further conference with the House, the Chair to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. BRYAN, and Mr. WARREN conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present a resolution, being a request of the Secretary of the Treasury to harmonize the plans of the new power plant with the plans for the adornment of the District proposed by the Art Commission and by Mr. Burnham.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 99) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury, as permitted by the power-plant contract, be requested to modify the plans as far as possible to better harmonize with the Burnham plans for the improvement of the commercial water front and with the general beauty and comfort of the city of Washington.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I object.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution goes over.

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT.

Mr. SHIELDS. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of Senate bill 3331.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. SHIELDS. I now ask unanimous consent that that bill, being the unfinished business, be laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be laid aside.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, several Senators have suggested that they would like to have a short executive session, and I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 15, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 14, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Let Thy blessing descend, O Lord God, our heavenly Father, upon us, that our objective may be defined by clear thinking, high ideals, noble endeavors; that our ways may harmonize with the best traditions, purest motives of the good and the true, whose lives stand as beacon lights in the progress of the past; whose names kindle the light of inspiration and lead on to the betterment of all that is nearest and dearest the hearts; that we may be worthy of the trust reposed in us by Thee and by our fellow men; that the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ may fill our souls with joy and peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, February 12, 1916, was read and approved.

BOLOGNESI, HARTFIELD & CO.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Claims, I ask unanimous consent to have recommitted to that committee the bill (H. R. 4885) for the relief of Bolognesi, Hartfield & Co., which is on the Private Calendar, reported adversely by the Committee on Claims. It was placed on the calendar at the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET]. I therefore ask unanimous consent that it be recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Delaware, by authority of the Committee on Claims, asks unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 4885 be recommitted to that committee. Is there objection?

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, where is the bill pending now?

The SPEAKER. The bill was reported adversely by the Committee on Claims, and that committee now asks that it be recommitted to it.

Mr. CARLIN. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

AGRICULTURE.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of agriculture.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of agriculture. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1559. An act to increase the limit of cost of public building at Park City, Utah.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 1559. An act to increase the limit of cost of public building at Park City, Utah; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill and joint resolution:

H. R. 9213. An act to authorize the Gary Land Co. to construct a bridge across the Grand Calument River, in the State of Indiana.

H. J. Res. 146. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to loan, issue, or use quartermaster's and medical supplies for the relief of destitute persons in the districts overflowed by the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA DAY—WASHINGTON & OLD DOMINION RAILWAY.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, this being District day, I call up the bill (H. R. 8810) to amend an act relating to the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia approved March 4, 1913, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That section 8, paragraph 1, of an act approved March 4, 1913, relating to the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia (37 Stat. L., p. 975), be amended by adding to the names of the companies excluded from the operation of said section, after the words "the Potomac River and Chesapeake Bay," in the third subdivision of said paragraph, on page 975, the following: "and the Washington & Old Dominion Railway, excepting as to the regulation of its operation inside of the District of Columbia."

With the following committee amendment:

Line 3, after the word "act," insert: "entitled 'An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes.'"

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, under the public-utilities act for the District of Columbia, this particular electric railroad company was declared to be a public utility of the District. As I am informed, this railroad has about 72 miles of track outside of the District of Columbia and about 72 feet inside the District of Columbia. This bill has been introduced for the purpose of taking this particular road from the control of the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia and leaving it subject to the laws of Virginia or to the Interstate Commerce Commission of the United States, to whichever it may properly belong.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. CROSSER. I notice that the report says that the purpose of the bill is to take that part only of this utility—the Washington & Old Dominion Railroad Co.—which lies outside of the District from the control of the District Public Utilities Commission. Where is there any language in the bill which indicates that the authority of the Public Utilities Commission will still control that part which lies in the District?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I doubt very much if the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia has authority over it, although it is specifically named in the utilities act.

Mr. CROSSER. I agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. But, to cure any question about it, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia desire the passage of this bill for the purpose of conclusively relieving them of all doubt. The corporation counsel has advised them, I am informed, that they have no jurisdiction over it, but they wish to be relieved of all doubt; and, in my judgment, all doubt should be removed.

Mr. CROSSER. What I am trying to get at is this: Whether or not we do not take that part of the line which lies in the District of Columbia out of the jurisdiction of the Public Utilities Commission?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The bill specifically provides that whatever of the road is in the District of Columbia shall be left subject to the laws of the District of Columbia.

Mr. CROSSER. If it does, I am satisfied.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. In other words, it is deemed best that whatever part of this railroad is in the District of Columbia should have jurisdiction exercised over it by the authorities of the District of Columbia, the same as other roads in the District. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the adoption of the committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JUVENILE CRIMINALS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill (H. R. 9803) to emancipate from certain disabilities children who have judgments of conviction of crime against them in the juvenile court of the District, which I send to the desk and ask to have read:

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no judgment of conviction against any child of record in the juvenile court of the District of Columbia under an act entitled "An act to create a juvenile court in and for the District of Columbia," approved March 19, 1906, shall operate as a disqualification of any such child for jury duty, or for holding office, or for any other public service under the Government of the United States or the District of Columbia, and no child against whom a judgment of conviction may stand in said juvenile court of the District of Columbia under said act aforesaid shall be denominated a criminal by reason of any such judgment, nor shall such judgment be denominated a conviction.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, during the past a number of children, some of tender age, have been convicted of crime in the District of Columbia. The trend of all modern thought is against that; but under the law those children who were so convicted before arriving at the age of 21 years are deprived of the right to vote or to serve upon juries. This bill is for the purpose of removing those disabilities. I apprehend that somebody may raise the question of the constitutionality of the proposed act upon the ground that it goes into the pardoning power which can be exercised by the President of the United States. I am rather inclined, however, to the opinion that Congress, having the constitutional exclusive right to legislate for the District of Columbia, would prevent its being an infringement upon the pardoning power of the President of the United States; but as the most that can be said of the bill is that it is of doubtful constitutionality, for the benefit of these children, I think that they should have the benefit of that doubt, and that the question of the constitutionality should be brought up later along in the courts rather than here.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. While I quite agree with all the gentleman says as to the bill, does the gentleman have any objection to moving to strike out section 2? The law provides when an act takes effect, and this only cumbers up the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the gentleman from Massachuetts [Mr. TINKHAM] is in charge of this bill, but he seems not to be upon the floor at this moment.

Mr. MANN. Section 2 only provides that the act takes effect at once. Now, it only cumbers up the bill, and ordinarily we move to strike it out.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman from Illinois will move to strike it out, I will agree to it.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will yield for that purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out section 2.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 2, by striking out section 2, in lines 4 and 5.

Mr. MANN. Will the Clerk read the language?

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FRAUDULENT ADVERTISING IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill H. R. 10490.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10490) to prevent fraudulent advertising in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful in the District of Columbia for any person, firm, association, corporation, or advertising agency, either directly or indirectly, to display or exhibit to the public in any manner whatever, whether by handbill, placard, poster, picture, film, or otherwise; or to insert or cause to be inserted in any newspaper, magazine, or other publication printed in the District of Columbia; or to issue, exhibit, or in any way distribute or disseminate to the public; or to deliver, exhibit, mail, or send to any person, firm, association, or corporation any false, untrue, or misleading statement, representation, or advertisement with a fraudulent intent to deceive, mislead, or induce any person, firm, association, or corporation to purchase, discount, or in any way invest in or accept as collateral security any bonds, bill, share of stock, note, warehouse receipt, or any security; or with the fraudulent purpose to deceive, mislead, or induce any person, firm, association, or corporation to purchase, make any loan upon, or invest in any property of any kind; or use any of the aforesaid methods with the fraudulent intent or purpose to deceive, mislead, or induce any other person, firm, or corporation for a valuable consideration to employ the services of any person, firm, association, or corporation so advertising such services.

SEC. 2. That prosecution hereunder shall be in the police court of the District of Columbia upon information filed by the United States district attorney for the District of Columbia or one of his assistants.

SEC. 3. That any person, firm, or association violating any of the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $500 or by imprisonment of not more than 60 days, or by both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court. A corporation convicted of an offense under the provisions of this act shall be fined not more than $500, and its president or such other officials as may be responsible for the conduct and management thereof shall be imprisoned not more than 60 days, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 4. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Illinois wish to ask a question?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I see that the report upon this bill uses this language:

It is not only intended by the bill to prevent the fraudulent advertising of goods, wares, and merchandise, and also—

And so forth.

What language in the bill would prevent the fraudulent advertising of goods, wares, or merchandise?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The words "goods, wares, and merchandise" were used in the first draft of this bill. Upon being submitted to the assistant corporation counsel that language was stricken from the bill and the word "property" was inserted in lieu thereof.

Mr. MANN. Where is that in the bill? There is this language in the bill on page 2, "make any loan upon or invest in any property of any kind."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is, I think, the place where the language "goods, wares, and merchandise" was used and upon the advice of the assistant corporation counsel the word "property" was substituted.

Mr. MANN. Well, I should say, with some hesitancy, perhaps, that this would not apply at all in any case to the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise at retail, and I doubt whether it would at wholesale. I do not know whether it was the intention to so apply.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman that that part of the bill to which the gentleman now refers was drawn by myself, and in that draft I used the language, "goods, wares, and merchandise"; but, as before said, I yielded to the opinion of the assistant corporation counsel and substituted language now in the bill.

Mr. MANN. I am not endeavoring to criticize the bill in any way, but it seems to me that the bill only applies practically to the deceiving of the people who purchase property for investment or purchase stocks and bonds; and perhaps that is as far as it ought to go; I would hesitate now to say.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will state to the gentleman that I yielded somewhat reluctantly to the suggestion, and I would myself, now, if it seems best, agree to reinstate that language.

Mr. MANN. I am not at all certain, and it is better to make progress slowly and provide for what is in the bill; but that provision in the report excited my attention and I did not know what that language referred to in the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That language was thought by the assistant corporation counsel to cover the very item which we are now discussing.

Mr. MANN. If the assistant corporation counsel thinks general language of that character in connection with this bill will cover the sale of property at retail, we ought to get a new assistant corporation counsel.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Were any hearings had on this bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The hearing extended to the representatives from the chambers of commerce and the corporation counsel's office.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Were the newspapers of the District heard on it at all?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. They were not, except through their daily issues.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Editorially they were favorable to the passage of a bill like this?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Unanimously so, I think.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In the matter of the clause to which the gentleman from Illinois referred, was it the purpose of the committee to protect persons who might invest in fake land schemes and mining stocks?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It was the purpose of the committee to protect the public from false advertisements relating to any character of property through which the public was being robbed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, I happen to know that certain advertising associations have asked for legislation of this kind with a view to preventing fake mining scheme advertisements and fake lot schemes, as so many innocent persons are often attracted by them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The assistant corporation counsel, who has largely helped in the preparation of this bill, has given the committee his opinion that this reaches that condition.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The committee made no effort to give hearings on the subject at all?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The committee never makes an effort to give hearings, but it never denies hearings. That is the policy of the committee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that if this bill passes it would affect newspapers very seriously.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think not. This bill fails to penalize any newspaper for publishing a false advertisement.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does it not require that a corporation convicted under the provisions of this act shall be fined not more than $500?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No. It punishes only the authors of the advertising.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then the newspaper is not held responsible for publishing?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; the newspaper is not bound by the provisions of this bill to obtain advance information whether the advertisement is false or not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Some time ago a schoolteacher who had accumulated some savings invested in building lots in this vicinity, and made complaint to me that she was unable to get any return or any satisfaction as the result of that investment. Who would be punishable in a case of that kind if a fraud had been committed?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Whoever brought this schoolteacher, whether in person or through the mails, or newspaper advertisement or any other kind of advertisement, the statement that this was a good investment, when in fact, it was known to be bad.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The solicitor, then, would be culpable?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. He is the man sought to be reached by the provision of this bill. The promoter is the man sought to be reached when that kind of stuff is sought to be disposed of.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But it is not a check upon newspapers?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Not at all.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RECORDER OF DEEDS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 7571, to provide for the appointment of a recorder of deeds in the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7571) to provide for the appointment of the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia shall be appointed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

After the word "Columbia," in line 5, insert the following:

"Provided, That no one shall be appointed to the position of recorder of deeds unless he be a citizen of the United States, and unless he has been a resident of the District of Columbia for three years next before his appointment, and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have power to remove the recorder of deeds at pleasure."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REGISTER OF WILLS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 7585, to provide for the appointment of the register of wills of the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7585) to provide for the appointment of the register of wills of the District of Columbia by the justices of the Supreme Court of said District.

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter the register of wills of the District of Columbia shall be appointed by the justices of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Line 4, after the word "by," strike out the words "the justices of."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. What is the theory of these two bills, one of which has just been passed, and this one? What change does this make? Who now appoints the register of wills? The President?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It takes the power away from the President to appoint and gives that power to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia; and the other amendment provides that the appointee shall be a bona fide resident of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MANN. The President desires to escape that onerous duty?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have no information upon that subject.

Mr. MANN. What is the point? What is the object of having the appointing power changed?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. This is an officer of the court and ought to be appointed by the court.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the register of wills is exactly an officer of the court. Certainly no more than the district attorney and the marshal, and other officials who are appointed by the President.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. He is the officer of that branch of the business of the probate court, and he passes upon the sufficiency of the sureties on bonds, and the court no doubt would feel better satisfied if he could be both appointed and removed by them.

Mr. MANN. I notice that this first amendment makes the appointment by the "court" instead of "by the justices"?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It seems better that the power be given to the court and not to the individual members of the court.

Mr. MANN. How many justices of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia are there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Six.

Mr. MANN. Any one of them could enter an order of the court removing or appointing. Might keep at it continually.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Well, I doubt——

Mr. MANN. I doubt whether that would be done. I think the usual practice to be, where this sort of thing is done, to let the individuals——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not think one of the justices could or would enter that kind of an order.

Mr. MANN. He certainly could, but whether he would or not, I do not know.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I doubt it.

Mr. MANN. The chief justice, I suppose, would be the man that would name the party.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I can say to the gentleman or anybody else whose mind may turn in that direction that my information is that the court does not contemplate any change.

Mr. MANN. It may not now, but it will some time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. When this one dies, perhaps.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman from Kentucky says, "Unless this one dies, perhaps." I would say, "Unless one dies certainly." That is one thing that is certain.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. For the benefit of the gentleman, I could change my language by putting the word "perhaps" in the middle of the sentence instead of at the end of the sentence, although it is correct as I put it.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman if he thinks it good policy to give an appointment of this kind to the court instead of to the administrative officials?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Oh, yes. As I said, this particular officer has to pass upon the sufficiency of bonds executed under an order of the court and many other pieces of business which he transacts under the court, and he ought to be appointed by the court instead of by the President of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of New York. I do not question that point; but why should not this power be given to the commissioners, the same as the power given in the case of the other officers?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. One is the recorder of deeds, which can not possibly be construed as being an appenage of any court. He is independent and free from the control of any court. He does nothing for any court. All he does is a service to the individuals of the public who come to have instruments recorded.

Mr. SMITH of New York. My only suggestion was that the tendency in all parts of the country is to take away from judges any power of appointment and all questions of patronage, and apparently this is adding power to give patronage to the court.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. This is being put on the same basis that a court commissioner or master in chancery would be.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "Columbia," in line 5, insert "and said court shall have power to remove said register of wills: Provided, That no one shall be appointed to the position of register of wills unless he be a citizen of the United States, and unless he has been a resident of the District of Columbia for three years next before his appointment."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the aemndment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill as amended.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JUVENILE COURT, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 8348) to amend an act entitled "An act to create a juvenile court in and for the District of Columbia," and for other purposes; and, pending that motion, I would be glad to come to some agreement with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as to the limit and control of general debate.

Mr. MANN. I would like to have two hours on this side.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Does the gentleman mean one hour on each side?

Mr. MANN. No; I would like to have two hours on this side.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, before the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of Union, that general debate upon the bill be limited to three hours—two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. MANN. No; by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CARY].

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CARY] and one hour by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8348; and, pending that, he asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to three hours—two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CARY] and one hour by himself. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ALEXANDER GRAHAM BELL.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I call up Senate joint resolution No. 97 on the Speaker's table, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 97, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 97) to appoint Alexander Graham Bell a member of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

Resolved, etc., That the vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class "other than Members of Congress" shall be filled by the appointment of Alexander Graham Bell, a citizen of the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma a question. Is he now a member of that board?

Mr. FERRIS. He is and has been since 1898, but his commission expires this month.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FERRIS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

JUVENILE COURT, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8348.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8348, with Mr. RAKER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill. as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8348) to amend an act entitled "An act to create a juvenile court in and for the District of Columbia," and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to have read a newspaper clipping from this morning's Washington Post.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the clipping indicated.

The Clerk read as follows:

CLARK PRAISES KITCHIN—ARRANT NONSENSE, HE SAYS, TO THINK LEADER WILL BE REMOVED—ENTITLED TO HIS OWN OPINION—SPEAKER HAS FAITH IN FORBEARANCE AND WISDOM TO EVOLVE PLANS FOR PREPAREDNESS WHICH ALL DEMOCRATS WILL SUPPORT—PROPOSITIONS CAN NOT BE "BULLED" THROUGH CONGRESS.

"Arrant nonsense" was the way Speaker CHAMP CLARK last night characterized the reports that the Democrats of the House are about to remove Representative CLAUDE KITCHIN, of North Carolina from the floor leadership in the lower branch of Congress because of his views on numerous questions, including preparedness, which are at variance with the views of the administration.

"All the chatter about sidetracking him is utter tomfollery," added the Speaker, who continued:

"Mr. KITCHIN was not appointed chairman of the Ways and Means Committee—he was elected by the same vote by which I was elected Speaker. By immemorial usage the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee becomes ex officio majority floor leader. Of course the House could remove him just as it could remove the Speaker, but nobody with sense enough to go in out of the rain proposes to remove him.

HOPES PATIENCE WILL WIN.

"It is a pity that all Democrats do not agree about all things, but Mr. KITCHIN has as much right to his opinion as the President has to his or I have to mine. I have faith that by the exercise of forbearance, moderation, and wisdom we will evolve plans for preparedness and other great questions such as raising revenue on which we can all stand. That is my hope and expectation. No man can bull a proposition through the House by main strength. The entire philosophy of success in that able and tumultuous assembly is to take things by the smooth handle, to rub the hair the right way of the hide, and to confer freely with Members, persuading rather than attempting to drive, yielding in nonessentials, firm as a rock on fundamentals. There are 435 Members, and everyone of them has a perfect right to his opinion and to express it whenever and wherever it seems to him meet and proper. If the busybodies who are trying to stir up strife by magnifying small differences of opinion among Democrats would help eliminate these differences, they would constitute themselves patriots instead of marplots.

BELIEVES IN KITCHIN.

"I was instrumental years ago in securing for CLAUDE KITCHIN his first valuable promotion. I believed in him then and believe in him now. He is one of the most brilliant men in public life, and I believe he will discharge the duties of his important position faithfully and well.

"So far as I am concerned, when I feel that I ought to leave the Speaker's stand to support or oppose on the floor any measure whatsoever, I shall do so—as I have a right to do—without any intent of supplanting Mr. KITCHIN, Mr. HAY, Mr. PADGETT, Mr. FITZGERALD, or any other chairman or leader."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CARY] now use some of his time.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Chairman, I yield an hour and 15 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] is recognized for 1 hour and 15 minutes.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to add a real old-fashioned Methodistical amen to the editorial which has just been read. [Applause.] I am going to follow that up with a plea for nonpartisan action for relief from a foreign monopoly.

A PLEA FOR NONPARTISAN ACTION FOR RELIEF FROM A FOREIGN MONOPOLY.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I know of no more humiliating fact connected with our national economic policy than that to-day the United States of America is compelled to humbly beg from the German Government the poor privilege of buying from a chemical factory in Charlottenburg the dyestuffs needed to print our money and make our postage and revenue stamps, and that such consent is only granted on condition that the State Department shall make a cash purchase in its own name, for governmental use only, and guarantee that they shall not be used for commercial purposes.

Having purchased and paid for them by the consent of a German King, this great Nation of a hundred million people must then, forsooth, humbly beg from an English King the poorer privilege of having them transported in a neutral ship from a neutral port, across an ocean which we had fondly believed to be free to every neutral power for noncontraband of war. [Applause.]

If I were boss I would bring them here under a convoy of American battleships. [Applause.]

This purchase amounts to $75,000, and a part of it is now in Rotterdam. The bureau has now enough material to continue its work for two months. This, if received by us, will permit an extension of work for nearly a year. A further supply is dependent upon England's permission for us to exchange linseed oil with Germany in payment for it instead of cash. As I learned these facts I wondered whether this Nation had again become a colony of a European monarchy and subject to orders in council and paper blockades, and our trade with the world absolutely controlled by our greatest commercial rivals.

A NEW DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

Is it not high time for the American people to issue a new declaration of industrial independence? [Applause.]

Congress has already been notified that the color of the uniforms for our soldiers and sailors must soon be changed unless some relief from the existing dyestuff famine is speedily secured.

If the war is long continued and the chemical plants on the Rhine should perchance be destroyed, who knows but that this Nation might ultimately be compelled to change the color of the national flag?

LABOR AND PRODUCTS AFFECTED.

Few people realize the embarrassments under which the industries of this country are now struggling because of our dependence upon one nation for our supply of dyestuffs.

The Bureau of Foreign Commerce states that "more than 2,000,000 working men and women are occupied in industries which are directly dependent upon the use of artificial colors" and that the value of the product is between three and four billions of dollars annually.

LOSS TO THE COUNTRY.

Four months ago the chief of the bureau, in a public address to the Chemical Club in New York, declared that "the total loss, direct and indirect, now being borne by American users of dyestuffs and dyed wares amounts to not less than $1,000,000 a day," or nearly $400,000,000 a year. The next morning's papers announced that this was an authoritative statement from the administration.

Gentleman, that is more than the Spanish-American War cost. It is at least two-thirds of the value of the entire cotton crop in the South. Four hundred and thirty days have elapsed since this matter was first brought to the attention of the House of Representatives, according to the RECORD. That means an accrued loss to-day of $430,000,000. It is a subject worthy of your serious and nonpartisan consideration.

If every penny of the specific duty which it is now proposed to add to the revenue rates of the present law should be added to the price to the consumer, it would take 100 years of that burden to equal the losses which the existing famine has brought upon the country in the last 12 months.

But that statement was made four months ago, and conditions have been growing more acute, from that day to this, as accumulated supplies have become exhausted.

FOREIGN MONOPOLY AND ITS RESULTS.

For 30 years the world has paid tribute to German monopoly, and the world is being scoured to-day to find relief.

Witnesses testified that they were bringing dyes from the interior of China at $7.50 per pound which in normal conditions were sold at 20 cents per pound.

Others testified that prices have advanced in some cases from 2,000 to 4,000 per cent and that it is impossible to secure many dyes at any price.

One of the witnesses, a finisher of cotton goods, told me that his firm paid in 1915 more than $300,000 excess on the same amount of dyes over what he paid in 1914.

Old typewriter ribbons and carbon papers are being gathered from the paper-stock warehouses and the dyes reclaimed from them are being sold at $15 per pound. The Scientific American says that a single keg of aniline dye, which ordinarily sells at $15, was sold at auction in London recently at $1,560.

WHAT IT MEANS TO COTTON.

Mr. Fuller E. Calloway, a representative of southern cotton mills, testified that customers had ceased to be interested in forward contracts and were asking extensions on past ones, and added:

The backbone of the present cotton market is my folks, who are spinning and weaving this cotton that goes out in volume, and if we don't get some relief, in addition to throwing our crowd on short rations, it is going to put the cotton farmer where he will get tired of holding his cotton. He won't have a good demand for it, as much as he wants to sell. And there are probably millions of laborers in the cotton fields, millions of people who are supported by it.

I call Members' attention to the fact that 70 per cent of this great crop passes through the dyers' hands before it reaches the consumer, and unless steps are taken now to relieve the dyestuff famine the price which cotton will bring in the fall is a question of vital importance to the South.

WHAT IT MEANS TO WOOL.

As with the cotton of the South, so it is with the wool of the Western and Mountain States, practically all of which is colored before use and at a normal cost of five times the cost of coloring cotton.

As with cotton and wool, so with silk, and leather, and paper, and fur, and the representatives of these great industries, utilizing the labor of millions of men and women, testified that supplies of German dyestuffs have reached the vanishing point and that domestic facilities were wholly inadequate to supply the deficiency and that it was useless to even hope for relief under existing conditions.

WHAT ARE THESE CONDITIONS?—WHO IS RESPONSIBLE FOR THEM?—WHAT IS THE REMEDY?

Perhaps a little history will help to answer these questions. By the tariff of 1864 aniline dyes were made dutiable at $1 per pound and 35 per cent ad valorem.

By the tariff of 1870 the duty was lowered to 50 cents per pound and 35 per cent ad valorem.

With this encouragement, even in the face of German competition, the dye industries began a slow development here, and in 1882 there were about a dozen assembling works depending upon foreign raw materials and attempting to supply the finished product to the American market.

By the tariff of 1883 the specific duty was removed, the ad valorem rate left at 35 per cent, and all the raw materials, both crudes and intermediates, were made dutiable at 20 per cent, and as a result the whole industry practically faded away in a single year.

In 1894 the ad valorem rate was lowered to 25 per cent, and raised again to 30 per cent in 1897, where it now stands.

When the revision of 1909 was made Mr. Payne had two things which he greatly desired to accomplish.

One was to bring the lace industry to the United States. He did it by putting lace machinery not made in this country on the free list for 15 months. As a result both lace and machinery for making it are now domestic products, and 29 factories are furnishing millions of dollars' worth to our people at less prices than they formerly paid for it and thousands of men and women are earning good wages in clean and healthy work. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The second project was to establish the coal-tar dye industry, and with that as a basis to develop a complete system of organic chemistry here.

After a thorough investigation of the accounts of at least one establishment he recommended free intermediates or raw materials and 35 per cent duty on the finished product of dyes.

No thought was given at that time by any American or, apparently, by anyone outside of Germany to the high-explosive side of the industry. But to prevent a possible monopoly here in dyestuffs I wrote a patent-working clause compelling the working of the German patents here or a forfeiture of them as the penalty.

Out of 1,247 German patents taken out here between 1900 and 1910, 844 were assigned to five great trusts in Germany.

THE BERNSTORFF-BACON TREATY.

The German Government instantly realized what the result would be, and the Bernstorff-Bacon treaty was negotiated before the bill could get out of the House of Representatives, and the working of any patent in either of these countries was made equivalent to the working in both.

The treaty was an advantage to us in other lines of industry, but it nullified our patent-working clause and was a complete surrender to Germany in coal-tar dyes and left to her her precious monopoly and almost unlimited facilities for producing an inexhaustible supply of high explosives, with no rival in the world who could compete with her in that respect.

GERMAN FORESIGHT.

We have seen the result of her foresight since August 1, 1914.

I have it on most excellent authority that there is practically no supply of dyes in Germany now, for nearly $400,000,000 of capital invested in a world-wide monopoly of one of the industrial arts, fostered and nourished and protected through 30 years of peace, was instantly mobilized for war when the armies were, and these factories have since been running at intensive speed turning out the high explosives which are an essential to modern warfare, and what may cause us now to take serious thought is the fact that provision has been made for a supply for five years after this war is over.

Japan has awakened and guaranteed 8 per cent dividends to Japanese-owned capital invested in dyestuffs and explosive plants built by Japanese citizens on Japanese soil.

Great Britain last year, but too late, subscribed $15,000,000 to the British Dyes Limited, and in addition to subsidizing the industry in other ways, has absolutely prohibited the future importations of the German product.

France and Russia are subsidizing the industry within their own territory.

When will the United States wake up, or will it be that by and by some Representative will tell the American Congress, as Lloyd George is telling England now, "Too late, too late."

The Payne bill went to the Senate with a 35 per cent rate on coal-tar dyes and colors and the intermediates free.

A STRANGLE HOLD RENEWED.

At once, then, as now, under the inspiration of the representatives of foreign trusts, the attack began and certain textile interests which had some times justly and sometimes arrogantly demanded a protection which they were unwilling to share with a less powerful but more needy industry, began to bombard the Senate with protests against the slight increase of duty, with the result that the old rate was restored and foreign monopoly renewed its strangle hold upon the industry.

Four years later the present law put a 10 per cent revenue duty on the intermediates and American submission to German supremacy in colors and dyes and high explosives became complete.

RESPONSIBILITY LOCATED.

Who was responsible for it? I say emphatically that both political parties were, for neither had given the home producers a living chance for 30 years and had left them unprotected from illegal attacks from abroad.

I quote from the testimony at the hearings for indisputable proof of this assertion. I asked Dr. Beckers about this.

Let me say that Dr. Beckers is the head of the Beckers Aniline Co., in Brooklyn, and was for years a director in one of the large German dyestuff trusts in Germany. He knows whereof he speaks.

Mr. HILL. I do not want you to answer this question, Dr. Beckers, if you feel you ought not to, but I would like to ask you if there is or has been, in your long experience in Germany, a coordination between the German Government and the chemical factories there in that direction?

Dr. BECKERS. Yes, sir; I know positively, from information which I have received from one of the largest chemical concerns in Germany, that the German Government, under all circumstances, will assist the German manufacturers by any means at their disposal in preventing a dyestuff industry growing up in any country outside Germany.

Mr. HILL. While you were a director in one of the German concerns, was it generally understood that a syndicate or cartel—I do not care how or what it was—practically controlled the output of the various chemical plants?

Dr. BECKERS. Yes, sir; that is true.

Mr. HILL. And arranged for competitive prices, etc.?

Dr. BECKERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HILL. How is that done? How is it effected?

Dr. BECKERS. There are two large combinations in Germany which include every dyestuff manufacturing establishment of that country, and these two large combinations have agreements to the effect that all profits are divided up between them.

Mr. HILL. And if they should desire to remove the competition afforded by the dyestuffs that you are manufacturing here in Brooklyn, regardless of cost, they would simply cut their prices to the point where you could not meet them, and the expenses involved would be distributed among the companies forming the combination?

Dr. BECKERS. They would. They would lower the prices so that we could not manufacture any more in this country, and they could do so because whatever they lose here they can make up by charging it to their Russian, Chinese, or other trade.

Dr. Pratt, Chief of the Bureau of Foreign Commerce, says, on page 202 of hearings:

The European artificial dyestuff industry is more than a large and prosperous industry. It is a highly organized combination of manufacturers seeking not only to enlarge their output and to compete with similar manufacturers in other parts of the world but carrying on a definite industrial program looking to the control of the market and the ultimate elimination of important competitors. This factor in the situation has made it practically impossible for the American dyestuff industry up to the present time to get a really firm foothold, and has made it necessary for us to import a large proportion of our dyestuffs and has placed us in the position where we find ourselves to-day, practically in the midst of a dyestuff famine.

The methods used by the European dyestuff manufacturers should not be unfamiliar to us Americans. When an American manufacturer has developed a certain dye and is selling it in considerable quantities the European manufacturers have suddenly reduced the price far below the actual cost of production, either in this country or abroad, and hence the American manufacturer has been forced to withdraw quite rapidly from the manufacture of that particular dye. These unfair methods of competition on the part of our competitors in Europe would not be tolerated for a moment under the recent trust legislation except for the fact that those who are responsible for these methods are not amenable to the laws of the United States.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will it interrupt the gentleman if I ask him a question?

Mr. HILL. Not at all.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I wish the gentleman would explain in a little more detail the connection between dyestuffs and high explosives.

Mr. HILL. I will get to that later. I shall speak of that in another section of my remarks.

I think it will be conceded by all familiar with the facts, that not only has the American industry been smothered by unfair German methods of competition but that it has been openly and avowedly done with the intent and purpose, first, of preventing an equipment for defense by this and other nations, and, second, of ultimately controlling the world's trade in textile and other products into the manufacture of which dyestuffs and other chemicals enter.

I have no word of criticism or condemnation for our German friends for the policy which they have pursued. I have a profound admiration for the skill, the ability, and the positive genius which has brought success to them thus far, but I marvel at the blindness of the rest of the world during recent years. [Applause.]

Now, what is the remedy and how and when shall it be applied, for it is inconceivable that a basic industry should be permanently enslaved when the possibility of triumphant freedom exists?

When we had a living chance, 35 years ago, we demonstrated that we had the requisite technical skill and ability to win success.

The Bureau of Mines, in a publication entitled "Coal Tar Products," by Horace C. Porter, shows that the States of Alabama, Colorado, Illinois, Kentucky, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Utah, Virginia, Washington, and West Virginia have enough of the primary raw material not only to prevent a shortage here but probably to supply the world if need be.

I desire at this time to call attention to a dispatch which I read a few days since in the New York Sun showing the extent to which the German Government has gone to sustain its position as controlling the monopoly and to preserve the par of the German mark:

GERMANY STRIVING TO RAISE VALUE OF MARK—EFFORTS LIKELY TO LEAD TO COMMERCIAL WAR WITH SCANDINAVIA.

LONDON, February 6.

The Daily Mail's Christiania correspondent telegraphs:

"A commercial war between Germany and the Scandinavian nations seems imminent, due to Germany's attempt to raise the value of the mark and improve the German balance of trade. This is to be done by enforcing practically a monopoly of the import trade of Scandinavian goods into Germany in the hands of a very limited number of firms, thus eliminating competition and forcing prices to the lowest possible figure.

"Simultaneously the Government has decided that export licenses on German goods going to Scandinavia will be given only on the condition that they are not to be sold under a minimum price fixed by the State.

"The effect of these measures was first felt in the iron industry, particularly in the trade of plates and angle iron for shipbuilding. The German manufacturers have annulled all contracts and informed the people dealing with them that no orders will be carried out unless considerably higher prices are paid, and paid in Scandinavian currency, not in marks.

"The next products to be manipulated were aniline dyes, the price of which was raised suddenly nearly 400 per cent. It is expected that this policy will gradually be applied to all articles necessary to Scandinavian industry.

"The Norwegian and Swedish newspapers urge concerted counter measures consisting of imposition of restrictions on exports similar to those imposed by Germany, especially with regard to iron ore, copper, and other metals, as well as horses, for which the demand is great in Germany, and requiring all payments to be made in Scandinavian currency, refusing to take marks."

OUTCRY OVER ANILINE DYES.

STOCKHOLM, VIA LONDON, February 9.

There is a great outcry and a demand for reprisals here on account of the German Government having ordered the cancellation of all contracts with Swedish customers for aniline dyes, unless the customers are willing to pay four times more than the contract price of the dyes and at the normal value of the mark.

But it also shows that in 1913 "the gross value of the by-products wasted here by beehive coking was over $75,000,000," which is five times our annual consumption and three-fourths of the value of dyestuffs consumed by the whole world.

We have unlimited capital ready for immediate use. What, then, is the remedy for the existing famine and what is the best and only way of securing future independence?

When the situation was brought to my attention last fall by the earnest appeals for relief which came to me from silk and paper manufacturers and hatters in Connecticut, I corresponded with the Departments of State and Commerce in the hope and belief that through the efforts of our diplomatic corps the shipments of noncontraband of war might, under proper safeguards, be resumed through neutral ports.

I never even dreamed of looking to tariff changes for relief, although I am sure that if the international conditions which now exist had obtained in 1913, the rates of duty on coal-tar dyes and colors, and many other items in the present law, would have been made far differently by the voluntary act of the party in power, and I believe that the economic changes which have already occurred in the world, and the greater ones which are sure to come when the war ends, are a full and complete justification for the adoption of the pending bill, and that the emergency of the case calls for prompt and radical action.

And I want now, in the presence of the House, to extend my thanks to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. KITCHIN, for the uniform courtesy which he has extended to me in bringing forward this proposition since the 1st of December, 1915, when this Congress met. [Applause.]

Long before Congress met in December I found that Germany would not consent to shipments of dyestuffs except upon "condition that four times their value in nitric acid and cotton should be delivered in return," and Great Britain would not consent to that.

And who can blame either of them, for both were fighting for their national life, while our demand was to prevent an embarrassment to the industries of a rival commercial power.

As a significant comment on German far-sightedness and on the pending measure as well, I cite the statement recently made to a number of gentlemen by the head of one of our largest cotton-finishing companies.

He said that months ago he urgently solicited a prominent German official in this country to secure consent for unconditional shipments of dyestuffs or they would lose the valuable trade which they had been so long acquiring, for it would surely be diverted to other sources of supply. His reply was, "We expect to lose your trade, for we expect the United States will put up their tariff against us, but we are in this thing and we must see it through to the bitter end."

At length, in utter despair of relief from abroad for my constituents, I turned to adequate protection to American capital and the use of the taxing power at home to meet the emergency.

As precedents for such action, in direct opposition to the avowed policy of the party then in power, I cite the course taken by the Republican Party, in the case of the Chicago fire, the destruction of Galveston, the coal strike in Pennsylvania, and the San Francisco earthquake. In every one of those cases the Republican Party responded, and responded quickly and generously, and almost without debate, reversed its economic policy and gave free trade in all supplies necessary to rebuild the waste places and furnish relief.

Free trade will not provide a remedy now, for there is no place on earth from which to draw supplies, and we are forced to rely on a guarantee now, of protection for our own people after the war is over, when the piratical competition of the past will be again renewed. I can not believe that the appeal of the Nation will be made in vain.

Two plans are suggested.

First. Antidumping legislation.

Second. The pending bill—to establish and maintain in this country the manufacture of dyestuffs.

ANTIDUMPING LEGISLATION.

I do not object to the antidumping law, because it can do no harm, but my judgment is that it will do no good.

My reasons are—

First. The importation of articles billed at cost and a fair profit added is not dumping, but is legitimate trade which can not be penalized, and if it were, would instantly involve us in a trade war. Germany can undersell us in dyestuffs without dumping.

Second. An antidumping law is worse than useless if there is no domestic industry to protect.

Third. No better antidumping law can be made than is now found in the customs administrative act, if its provisions concerning undervaluation are vigorously enforced, and if the appraisers would adopt the motto of "America first" and look to a fair protection for the home market rather than to the revenue received from larger importations.

Fourth. The provisions of our antitrust laws do not run beyond the 3-mile limit on our coasts, and to attempt to make criminals of citizens for buying as cheaply as they can abroad is simply ridiculous.

Fifth. The best preventive of dumping and undervaluation of imports is by a complete system of graded specific duties, such as was worked out by the German tariff commission by six years of hard study. This country has much to learn from the French and German methods of tariff making in that respect, and there is work enough for a tariff commission along this line.

HOUSE BILL 702.

The only other relief proposed is found in House bill 702, introduced in Congress on the first day of the present session, and which, if passed on that day, would have at least prevented two months' hoarding and gambling in our rapidly disappearing stocks of colors and dyes, and would have changed doubt and uncertainty as to the future into confidence and assurance of quickly enlarged home production and ultimate freedom from foreign monopoly, for who knows when the European war will end?

BASIS OF THIS BILL.

The bill is based upon the report and recommendation of the greatest tariff commission which the world has ever known—the American Chemical Society—composed of 10,000 chemists under the able leadership of Dr. Charles H. Herty, of Chapel Hill, N. C., as its president. I commend his statement before the Ways and Means Committee to every Member of Congress.

At the very outbreak of the European war, foreseeing the dangers which confronted our industries, they appointed a committee to consider and report what steps should be taken to establish and maintain an all-around, self-contained, independent coal-tar chemical and dye industry in the United States.

The committee consisted of—

Dr. Bernhard C. Hesse, for many years connected with one of the great German chemical plants and now recognized all over the world as a leading consulting chemist in this country. He is a Democratic free trader, according to his own designation made to me personally.

Prof. J. B. F. Herreshoff, the first recipient of the Perkin medal, which is the highest chemical honor in the United States.

Hon. Herman A. Metz, a former Member of this House and the head of the Farbwercke Hoechst Co., of Germany and New York. Nobody every accused Mr. Metz of not knowing thoroughly the business in which he is engaged.

Mr. I. F. Stone, president of the National Aniline & Chemical Co., of New York.

Mr. D. W. Jayne, manager of the Barrett Manufacturing Co., Frankford, Pa.

Dr. J. M. Matthews, a consulting expert to the textile trades.

Dr. Allen Rogers, professor of chemistry, Pratt Institute, Brooklyn, N. Y.

I wish we had such a tariff commission as that for every schedule of the tariff law, and I wish that every Member of the House would read the report of that committee.

SUMMARY OF THE REPORT.

Its conclusions were as follows:

A. To prevent the unfair underselling alleged to be practiced by foreigners in this country, the adoption of an effective antidumping clause.

B. The so-called coal-tar "intermediates," which are the basis of the coal-tar chemical industry, inclusive of explosives, medicinals, and dyestuffs, should be assessed one-half of whatever the finished dyes are taxed for tariff purposes; all coal-tar dyes, without exception, to be taxed alike, namely, 30 per cent ad valorem and 7½ cents per pound specific.

C. Changes in the patent laws, such as by compulsory licensing or compulsory working clauses are wholly ineffective, do more harm than good, and should not be attempted.

Your committee recommends that this report be submitted to the appropriate committees of Congress.

The report was made November 6, 1914, and came into my hands by chance a year later and when I was utterly discouraged by my complete failure to secure relief for my people. Acknowledging my own ignorance of this highly technical subject, I consulted the best experts I could find, and drew House bill 702, with the report as the basis of it.

RATES OF DUTY.

The ad valorem rate on the finished product is 30 per cent, precisely the same as in the Underwood law. The specific duty of 7½ cents per pound is the practical equivalent of the increased duty placed on the intermediates, which is 3¾ cents per pound and 15 per cent ad valorem, in place of 10 per cent ad valorem under the Underwood law.

That is, no real, actual added protection is given to the manufacturer of the finished dye unless he combines with such assembly process the production of the "intermediates"—I want my friends to note that fact, that the manufacturer does not get one cent of added protection under this bill unless he combines with such assembly process the production of the intermediates—and so helps to build up in this country a self-contained industry in the products of American coal and utilizes the by-products of the coke ovens, which are now being wasted to an enormous extent, one-sixth only being saved here as against five-sixths in Germany.

It is said that it is possible to derive about 50,000 different dyes from coal, but of several thousand already made only about 900 have been developed as successful commercial propositions. Of these not less than 25 nor more than 50 have become the necessities of industrial life. The remainder are whims of fashion and the luxuries of the trade. May I ask the attention of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee?

In the very able letter sent by the chemical committee to me justifying their report they say that the proposed duty will be equivalent to 65 per cent ad valorem on dyestuffs exported from Germany in 1913, the average value being 21.53 cents per pound. That might be true.

But they evidently overlooked the fact that the proposed compound duty is applied both to value and weight, and that to get the true equivalent of the specific rate for the whole schedule it is necessary to equalize the quantities of the various kinds imported. To illustrate—

1 pound of dyes, valued at 10 cents, carries—
Ad valorem duty	$0.03
Specific duty	.075
Total	.105
1 pound of dyes, valued at $1, carries—
Ad valorem duty	.30
Specific duty	.075
Total	.375
Total value of 2 pounds, $1.10; total duties received	.48
Average value of 1 pound, 55 cents; average duty received	.24

Equivalent ad valorem of proposed duty, 43.6 per cent.

But in actual importations this is too high, for with an ad valorem duty only dyes will be imported in any form, but with the specific duty added they will come as highly concentrated products, costing double, triple, and quadruple prices per pound, with the same specific duty of 7½ cents a pound laid against them.

The probabilities are that a year's importations under the proposed rate will give an equivalent ad valorem of 35 to 40 per cent instead of 30 per cent as now.

COST TO CONSUMERS.

One witness, figuring the increased duty at 12 per cent, ignoring domestic competition and assuming that the entire increase was paid by the woolen, silk, cotton, leather, and hosiery industries, estimates that the added cost to their product would be one-thirtieth of a cent per yard.

In my judgment this is in excess of the possible cost, but whether it is or not, it is too little to be distributed to the ultimate consumer. I am very sure that domestic competition will speedily reduce the cost below that of former years.

In any event we have the unanimous statement of the chemical committee that this is probably "the lowest schedule that will induce complete, self-contained, independent manufacture within the United States"; and as a witness, Mr. Metz, replied to my questions as follows:

Mr. HILL. Mr. Metz, as a manufacturer, importer, and dealer, you have twice stated in writing that the provisions of this bill are necessary to establish an independent and permanent industry in this country, if the country wishes to establish it?

Mr. METZ. Yes, sir.

Mr. HILL. And it is not too high, but that it is high enough?

Mr. METZ. That is the minimum.

Mr. HILL. That is the minimum?

Mr. METZ. On anything less you will be off, anyway. I do not know whether this is high enough.

CONSUMERS' INSURANCE.

A new feature in the economic history of this country was given in the hearings on the bill when the representatives of more than 3,000,000,000 of American products insistently called for increased duties on their own raw materials to encourage domestic competition, which should be to them an insurance against any repetition of the famine which is now proving so disastrous to them, many of them in textile trades squarely reversing their position in former years and admitting that their present experience had given them new ideas upon the whole subject.

ABUNDANCE OF CAPITAL.

Will capital respond to the inducements which this measure offers if it becomes a law and accept battle, not only with a strongly intrenched and highly remunerative industry in Germany but with the subsidized and Government-aided plants which the necessities of war have forced into life in other countries?

I am confident that it will.

There are three establishments in the United States to-day turning out finished coal-tar dyes in a limited variety of colors, and with a production, in the aggregate, of 6,500 tons per year. Our annual requirements are 30,000 tons.

Two of these plants were represented at the hearings. In response to questions, Dr. Beckers, of the Beckers Aniline & Chemical Co., said:

Mr. HILL. Dr. Beckers, as I understood you, you have stated that the duties in this bill were sufficiently high to induce you to expand your establishment and output of this industry?

Dr. BECKERS. I will say that the duties could be higher generally if you wanted to insure the rapid establishment of the dyestuff industry, but I think they will be sufficient as they stand. At any rate, there is no doubt that this bill will not create a so-called hothouse industry. We will have a healthy industry.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not a fact that you could triple or quadruple within six months your production of dyestuffs if this bill were passed?

Dr. BECKERS. Yes, sir; and I may state this, in order that you may understand exactly the conditions as they are, that I have found that if this bill should pass that I will have, instead of three-quarters of a million dollars at my disposal, at least from four to five million dollars.

Mr. Schoellkopf, of the Schoellkopf Aniline & Chemical Works (Inc.), of Buffalo, N. Y., said:

If the bill is passed, we have been asked what we propose to do—what the American manufacturers propose to do. I can only speak for my own company. We stand ready to put in a million dollars as fast as we can get it in, and more if necessary, if we feel there is going to be a permanent industry built up. If we can not feel that way, we believe we have put in about all we ought to put in.

The correspondence of other parties expresses like readiness to help build up the industry, and my judgment is that within six months from the passage of this act many millions of dollars will be found invested in chemical plants in the coal-producing States, and that within a year or two at the most a full supply of the dyes essential to our basic industries will be furnished by competing home establishments.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I have heard the statement that we are producing about one-fifth of the amount we need of dyestuffs under the present law.

Mr. HILL. That is correct.

Mr. FESS. And that we could produce all that we need. Now, what should be done?

Mr. HILL. I printed in the RECORD the other day an exact statement of what is now being produced, which is nearly double what was being produced at the beginning of the war. There is no demand for this bill or any other bill as a matter of protection so long as the war lasts. It will tend immediately to stop gambling and speculation in a rapidly diminishing stock of dyes and in six months will begin to add to the supply. It is the absolute certainty of the destruction of capital and the scrapping of plants at the the end of the war, admitted by the administration, and admitted by everybody who knows anything about it, which would make it a waste of time to attempt to establish this industry here after the war is over without the assurance of adequate protection.

Mr. FESS. And the gentleman has no doubt whatever that with this protection the business would grow?

Mr. HILL. I have no doubt, because I am backed up in that belief by a committee of seven men representing 10,000 chemists in the United States, who say it will do the work, and by many reliable men who assure me that they will put their money into it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. I received a letter this morning from the leading clothing house in my town of Crookston, Minn., saying, among other things, that the wholesale price of ordinary overalls for workmen and laborers had been increased because of the dyestuff famine. I think they stated that there had been an increase of $3 a dozen on overalls. Is that a fact?

Mr. HILL. I have letters showing that a demand has been made for a 10,000 per cent advance on some dyes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Does the gentleman think if we establish this industry it will reduce the price of clothing down to what it formerly was?

Mr. HILL. Under ordinary circumstances the cost of dyeing is not great. The testimony before our committee was that an ordinary suit of men's clothes cost 2½ cents to 5 cents to dye them under ordinary circumstances; but it makes a mighty difference whether you increase the price 5,000 or 10,000 per cent.

Mr. STEENERSON. It makes a difference of 25 cents a pair for a pair of ordinary overalls, according to this statement which I have received.

Mr. HILL. I have not figured that out, but I should think that was rather a large estimate. Those things are ordinarily sold at a fixed price.

Mr. STEENERSON. They state that there has been this much increase in the wholesale price.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. My colleague, of course, is aware that in the case of overalls the proportion of the value of the dye to the value of the cotton is unusually large.

Mr. HILL. Very much larger than in anything else that is made. That appeared in the testimony before the committee.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Speaking of the prices at which the cheaper grades of dyes were to be had, the gentleman will recall the testimony of some one before the committee that for the same amount of dye for which he ordinarily paid $1,100 he had just paid over $50,000 for dye which he had purchased in China.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Wilkie stated to me that he had drawn his check the week before for $52,000 for a quantity of dye purchased in the interior of China, four weeks distant from the coast, and that that same dye under ordinary circumstances would have cost him a few hundred dollars.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Eleven hundred and forty dollars.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does the gentleman believe that the present war prices for these dyes will not induce our capitalists and manufacturers to take the risk of erecting factories and going into the business?

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, they are doing that now and putting the profits they are making, these two or three companies, it so appeared in the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means, into the plants; but they will not go beyond that. The trouble with that is this: Germany taxes capital, and the United States taxes property. The American manufacturer taking his profits and putting them into the plants simply makes himself subject to further and further taxation. In Germany it is written off in order to escape taxation, because there they tax capital. I know of one case where a German plant paid a dividend of 36 per cent. It is the most profitable industry in Germany. The Government came in and examined their books. They had made 20 per cent more, intending to write this off their plants, and the German Government compelled them not to write off their plant, but to pay an additional dividend of 20 per cent, making 56 per cent in that year. That is the danger. Taxation over there is a premium on a profitable industry compared with our methods of taxation.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then the gentleman does not think that the current high prices due to the war would induce an important, material, and lasting increase in production?

Mr. HILL. Absolutely no, because the certainty is testified to by the officers of the administration right straight through, by the chemists themselves, by those who are at all familiar with it, that some regulation and control and protection must be furnished to this industry after the war is over or else the foreign monopoly to which we have submitted for 30 years is bound to continue.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then the gentleman's idea is to substitute this 7½ cents specific duty for the war protection at this moment?

Mr. HILL. Yes, partially so, but to no such extent as the war and famine is giving it.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. FESS. A statement reached my desk and I presume it did all of the desks of Members the other day, that we were producing one-half of the dyestuffs. I presume other Members saw that also. According to the gentleman's statement that is entirely misleading.

Mr. HILL. Such statements are going about all of the time. It was for that reason that I submitted the day before yesterday an absolute inventory of the product of American mills to-day. I was told somewhat authoritatively that the United States Steel Corporation was going to go into the manufacture of intermediates and dyes, and a telegram was at once sent to them and the reply was that they did not even contemplate making either crudes, intermediates, or dyes. We were making about 3,000 tons a year when the war broke out. The profit on what has been made since has been put into the expansion of the plants, and we are now making 6,500 tons, while we have a consumption of 30,000 tons. That means famine.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. ROGERS. Assuming that the Hill bill should become a law, it could be changed by Congress the next day or the next month or the next year?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. ROGERS. In view of that circumstance, how can it be that these manufacturers will dare to invest their millions in endeavoring to establish a new industry?

Mr. HILL. They have manifested their faith and confidence before in the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States and in the President, and I hope the time will never come when our own people, our own citizens, in investing their money in good faith are not willing to rely on fair treatment from our own Government. [Applause.]

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. TEMPLE. Has the gentleman inquired into this possibility of investment under the stimulus of war prices in the light of the history of 1812?

Mr. HILL. Oh, it was destroyed in one year, the whole industry—oh, the gentleman means in 1812? I was speaking of 1883.

Mr. TEMPLE. Beginning with the embargo and nonintercourse act.

Mr. HILL. That simply intensified our troubles.

Mr. TEMPLE. From 1807 a great many industries were established, but the high tariff of 1816 became absolutely necessary to preserve them when the war was over.

Mr. HILL. Absolutely. I want to put this thought to you gentlemen for your consideration. You and I do not know when this war is going to end or how it is going to end. Twenty miles of the banks of the Rhine are covered with chemical plants. Supposing, in the providence of God, they should be destroyed during the progress of this war, where would we stand; where would all of the other nations of the world stand? Japan foresees the possibility of danger and is hiding itself. Great Britain has done the same thing, while we sit here trusting in our own American good luck. I do not believe it is safe to test it a great while longer. [Applause.]

MATERIAL EQUIPMENT FOR DEFENSE.

There is another phase of this question to which I have thus far only casually referred.

The present condition of the whole world makes it a matter of supreme importance.

I do not believe that there is one Member of this House who is not ready and eager to help by his vote to do whatever is necessary to "make adequate preparation for national defense," and, if need be, to make personal sacrifice to that end.

What differences there are relate to methods and manner of paying for it.

Guns and ships and forts are enormously expensive, and large armies and navies are a direct burden upon the industrial life of any nation, but the purpose of this bill is to develop a new industry and at the same time be ready to make the high explosives which are absolutely essential to modern warfare, and to do it by the investment of private capital instead of by taxing the people for the construction of plants, which will be wholly useless in times of peace, and without a trained force of employees in the war time, which we all hope may never come.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. I was very much interested; and the question of high explosives opens up a new thought perhaps. Is it the gentleman's information now that the high explosives also come from the coal tar?

Mr. HILL. I am coming to that now.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. HILL. I will state it briefly, so that the gentleman can get it in the concrete. In the destructive distillation of coal certain products are carried about half way—perhaps the much more expensive part of the process—in the production of so-called "intermediates." When they get to a certain point, by further treatment they pass into high explosives, and by another treatment they pass into dyes. More than half—probably two-thirds—of the plant for manufacturing chemicals is the cost of making what are called "intermediates," which are treated and made into explosives in one way, and if treated in another way are made into dyestuffs. There are 50,000 different colors or dyes.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Then, the base of the dyestuff is also the base of the explosive?

Mr. HILL. Absolutely; and I am going to demonstrate it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman please name three or four of the articles which he called "intermediates"?

Mr. HILL. I would not have the time—the names are so long. The gentleman will remember the list in the tariff bill——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Those long ones?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Well, I will excuse the gentleman.

Mr. HILL. My understanding is benzol starts at the bottom, and it is distilled and treated.

I quote from the testimony of Dr. Hesse, who says:

If we did have a complete self-contained coal-tar industry in this country—and by that I mean an industry that will produce its crude, intermediates, and its finished dyes—we would have an equipment—and by that I mean actual physical plant—we would have an equipment which could, with comparatively little delay, be converted into a device to manufacture explosives, and we would have the nucleus of a trained body of men—workmen, if you please—foremen, and superintendents who could, with very little added time, learn how to make these explosives properly, and they then begin to act as a nucleus for an accretion or growth of the men necessary to do the work.

I have been a practical man all my life, but I do not understand the chemical industry; but I do know when I meet men over and over again who understand their business, and I have met two such men in this hearing—Dr. Schoellkopf and Dr. Beckers—who, I think, know their business, and I put some questions to them.

I want to supplement that by the statement of the manager of the oldest and largest dyestuff plant in the United States, Dr. Schoellkopf:

Mr. HILL. How long would it take you, on the demand of the Government—and I understood you to say that there should be some relation between the Government and these chemical plants, without specifying what it should be—how long would it take you to begin to turn out explosives if you had an order to start, say, on Monday morning?

Mr. SCHOELLKOPF. The processes used in making intermediate products and in making explosives are practically identical. I should say we could begin to turn out explosives in a week.

Mr. HILL. How long would it take you, if the war was over and you went back to the manufacture of dyestuffs, to resume the manufacture of those products?

Mr. SCHOELLKOPF. If we had the material, we could start manufacturing in a week. There are only certain plants that enter into the manufacture of explosives. In other words, the color plants proper are not used in the manufacture of explosives at all. Only the intermediate plants are used, so that the color plants would not be disturbed at all.

Mr. HILL. And with a complete, self-sustaining industry you would practically be in the position of a right arm of the United States Government in case of war in furnishing the explosives required in modern warfare. Is that not correct?

Mr. SCHOELLKOPF. Absolutely.

Mr. HILL. And within a week after the war closed you could return to the industry of manufacturing dyestuffs?

Mr. SCHOELLKOPF. Yes.

Mr. HILL. I fully agree that there should be some coordination between the Government and these factories. Does such coordination between the Government and such chemical factories exist? Is there any between the Government and your factory?

Mr. SCHOELLKOPF. No.

Mr. HILL. I am sorry to say that I do not know of any such coordination.

Mr. Schoellkopf closed his testimony as follows:

I do not look on this as a political measure. I feel that in order to keep our enormous industries going it is absolutely necessary to manufacture these products here, aside from the more necessary thing of having these plants ready to manufacture explosives in case of need. Some day this Nation will cease to exist unless we have that industry.

I want to add to that the statement of Dr. Beckers, who was formerly a director in one of the great plants in Germany:

Mr. HILL. Dr. Beckers, would you confirm the statement made by Dr. Schoellkopf that your plant in Brooklyn could be turned into a manufactory of explosives within a week or 10 days?

Dr. BECKERS. I consider we could start to make explosives, provided we would get an order to do so, within a week. If we got the order to-day we could start next week.

Mr. HILL. And upon the termination of the demand for explosives, is it safe to assume you could resume manufacturing your dyestuffs within a corresponding time?

Dr. BECKERS. Yes, sir; we could, because we use exactly the same raw material and exactly the same apparatus in making explosives as we do in manufacturing dyestuffs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HILL. May I have just a few moments more?

Mr. CARY. I yield 10 minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. HILL. Let me add one very significant clipping from the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs:

Mr. TILSON. In the case of necessities for the manufacturing of high explosives are not certain materials used, the same as are used in the manufacture of dyestuffs?

Gen. CROZIER. Some of them are, and some of them are by-products of the same kind of operations.

Mr. TILSON. Some things we do not produce in this country in large quantities?

Gen. CROZIER. Have not been produced in the past in large quantities.

Mr. TILSON. Are we not somewhat dependent to-day upon foreign supplies for some of the very necessary products for the making of high explosives?

Gen. CROZIER. We have been up to the present time; yes, sir.

Mr. TILSON. But we have raw material sufficient to make the things, have we not?

Gen. CROZIER. Yes, sir.

And we have not a single particle of coordination between our own Government and the possible makers of the high explosives that are necessary even to make a torpedo or a hand grenade useful.

This measure is a long step toward "adequate preparation for national defense," and it means defense from foreign control in peace as well as in war.

I submit it on one side to your judgment, on the other to your patriotism, and on both sides to your vote.

I say frankly to you that I do not fear the hosts who are now pitted against each other in deadly strife, but I believe we should always be prepared to defend this land against armed attack from any nation on earth.

What I fear most is at the end of the present war, when the order goes forth to mobilize the industrial armies of all Europe to recoup the losses which they are now incurring and capture the trade of the neutral nations.

Aside from in Poland, Belgium, and northern France, the factories of Europe are being run as never before in a tremendous effort to produce the necessities of life and the requirements of modern warfare, and the world is being exploited at enormous cost to make up for their deficiencies.

Factories have been taken over by Governments, enlisted workmen have been detailed from armies, women are being trained to do men's work, and old men and boys are brought in to help supply the needs of the armies in the trenches.

With war stopped and demand cut off for factory products and soldiers going back to look for their jobs, the supply of labor will be excessive and the workingmen of Europe will face the lowest wage scale they have ever known. The German Government is already realizing the seriousness of the impending situation, and according to Alwin Koersten, of the Trades Employment Bureau of Berlin, are looking favorably on the proposition to retain in service and on furlough all such soldiers as in the ordinary course of events would be mustered out immediately at the conclusion of hostilities.

Leaders of responsible organized labor are declaring that the funds reserved against unemployment now will not be enough to take care of the situation when the flood begins. This is their view of the future from conditions in Germany four months ago.

As I view it now, the consumptive power of all the belligerents will be practically destroyed by enforced economies for many years, and the taxes to carry the enormous war debt will compel the export of factory products to those nations which can pay for them, and the long hours and tax-ridden wages of England, Germany, and France will then force idleness and unemployment here and paralyze the American system of wages which now prevails.

Our chance with the belligerents is now, our danger in the future, and the chance and danger is from all alike.

The demand is made, and rightly so, that all Americans should stand together regardless of party affiliations in defense of the Nation's honor and dignity and sovereign rights.

Why can we not stand together in an earnest effort to release our Nation from foreign control of one of the world's greatest industries, and by so doing bring greater prosperity to many a workingman's home, for I believe that the American home is just as sacred as the American flag which floats over it. [Loud applause.]

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN].

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I love peace, but I love my home, my country, and my flag more.

I hate war, and I would not vote one dollar out of the Public Treasury to prepare for a war of aggression or conquest, but I will vote all the money necessary to prepare to defend my home and my country's integrity and honor against an attack from any source whatsoever. [Applause.]

This I believe to be the feeling of every patriot in this broad land of ours.

I know there are those, as patriotic and loyal as I am, who say there is no danger of an attack, and why this hysteria over the question of adequate "preparedness"? I hope, Mr. Chairman, that they are true prophets, but how am I to know that they are? Even as late as June 1, 1914, if a Member had arisen in his place on this floor and asserted that a great war was imminent in Europe, he would have been laughed to scorn, and yet within 30 days from that time one-half of the world was on fire and all Europe was engaged in the awful tragedy of war.

I am reminded of the words of the old prophet, speaking by inspiration, thousands of years ago, when he said:

Man also knoweth not his time; as the fishes that are taken in an evil net, as the birds that are caught in the snare, so are the sons of men snared in an evil time when it falleth suddenly upon them.

I am also reminded that the servant said to Mohammed: "Shall we trust the camels to Allah to-night?" And he answered: "Yes; but tie them first." I am willing to trust that we will not be attacked, but I want to first get ready to repel the attack.

Mr. Chairman, there are those also who are in favor of being prepared to repel an attack, but who say that we are sufficiently prepared now. If these are right, then I am glad. But our President, than whom there is no more peace-loving but patriotic man living, and who is, under the Constitution, charged with the solemn duty of advising Congress from time to time of the state and condition of the Union, thinks that we are not sufficiently prepared. Unless the facts shall show that he is in error on this matter, I shall feel it my duty to accept his judgment.

It must not be inferred from what I have said that I am in favor of an elaborate military program. God forbid! Next to actual war I believe that the greatest calamity that could befall us would be for us to commit this country to a program of "militarism." I say next to war, for I believe that that kind of a program would, in the inflamed condition of the world, speedily lead to war. And I am opposed to that with my whole heart. However, I think that the next greatest calamity that could befall us would be to sit supinely by and suffer our country to be attacked when we are not prepared to defend ourselves.

In a number of speeches which I have heretofore made on this floor and elsewhere I have opposed a policy which I likened to a fellow who would strap a six-shooter around him, don a sombrero, put his trouser legs down his boot tops and a cigar in his mouth, and start down the street. I said he would not have to wait long before he found the trouble that he was evidently looking for. I still say that is true, but there is a great difference in a man doing that and in one who provides himself with a gun and ammunition at home, to be used in case some fellow attempts to batter down his door and invade and despoil the sanctity of his home. In that case I would say: "Be prepared to shoot, and shoot to kill." [Applause.]

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that the term "preparedness" is a relative or indefinite one. It may mean one thing to me and entirely a different thing to you, due to our different viewpoints. I am sure that what I should regard as sufficient preparation would not be at all satisfactory to the "militarist" of this House or to the ammunition makers of the country, and I am also sure that what those people would regard as reasonable "preparedness" would, to my mind, be the rankest and most dangerous "militarism."

Therefore, as to the extent to which we ought to go, each one of us must be his own judge. My hope and desire is that we may always be prepared to defend ourselves, but God save us from placing our country in a position where the military will ever supersede the civil authority. As long as Woodrow Wilson shall be President I would have no fear of this, but if another should succeed him, God alone can tell whether he might not listen to the siren voice of the "militarist" and munition manufacturer.

Oh, you say there is no danger. I answer there is great danger. There are those among our own citizens whose greed for gold has smothered out all the patriotism, if they ever had any, who in order to create a demand for armaments which they manufacture would gladly welcome "militarism" or even war on a large scale. The opinion of such men weighs naught with me, but I am only one. I can only wish that whatever money we may spend in making such preparations as we may make that not one dollar of it should find its way into their greedy and bloodthirsty coffers.

Mr. Chairman, I may digress far enough here now to say that I have been and am now uncompromisingly in favor of the Government providing itself with the equipment necessary to manufacture its own armaments.

On December 6, 1913, long before war was thought of, in a speech on this floor I said, among other things, "I opine, Mr. Speaker, that if this naval program must go on, that if we are to continue to build great battleships with which to destroy our fellow men, if we will build all our future ships in the Government navy yards and then act favorably on the recommendation of the present Secretary of the Navy and build plants for the manufacture of our own armor and all of our powder and other ordnance, the place that has heard the voice of the big-navy advocate will hear him no more forever." I am still of that opinion.

This, Mr. Chairman, is not only true of the manufacturers themselves but is also true of the different interests throughout the country who own stock in these concerns. While I have but little respect for the pretended patriotism of the munition manufacturers, yet I do acknowledge their shrewdness. I am informed that they have very adroitly placed much of the stock in their concerns among the owners and managers of many of the newspapers throughout the country—I refer to many of the dailies in the cities of considerable size—and in that way dangle before their eyes each day the possibilities of large dividends in case of war or the adoption of an extensive military program. Let me give an example of this: A newspaper in my district, the Springfield Daily Leader, criticizes me because I am in favor of preparing only for defense, but it wants us to prepare for an aggressive war also. I do not believe that this paper thus criticizes me simply because I refused to appoint its editor postmaster, but there is something more potent behind its advocacy of "militarism." The editor of that paper at one time told me that he owned stock in the United States Steel Trust, and you know war brings dividends, and what do they care for your boy or mine so long as the dividends are large and paid promptly? Now, if these facts be true, and I believe that they are, need we be surprised at the almost unanimous demand of such a press for an elaborate military program on the part of Congress?

But, Mr. Chairman, the opinions of these selfish interests ought not to influence our action. Neither ought they to deter us from doing our duty. They have not deterred our President and they ought not to deter us. We can control our own actions, but we can not control the actions of all the other peoples of the world.

> Breathes there a man with soul so dead
> Who never to himself hath said,
> This is my own, my native land?

Then will we not prepare to defend it?

You and I, my colleagues, while we occupy our present positions, are charged with the responsibility of providing means whereby our people may protect themselves and their homes. If we fail or neglect to do this, then we deserve to be driven from our places.

This is no party question; it is as broad as the land. Let us be patriots, not partizans. In this crisis our work is a "man's job," an experienced "man's job." Let us be courageous, not cowardly.

Mr. Chairman, there is another phase of this war situation which has given me considerable worry. I refer to the sale of armaments by our people to the nations now engaged in war. I recognize the fact to be true in permitting this traffic in arms and ammunitions we are entirely within our rights under the practices and customs of nations; but as a matter of conscience, are we right? I have reached the conclusion that we can not be consistent in praying for the war to end and at the same time placing in the hands of the belligerents the means of carrying it on. I will therefore vote for an embargo on arms and ammunition if the opportunity presents itself.

While we have those among us who would welcome the most extensive and elaborate military program because it would means riches to them, we have those also who oppose any preparation whatever, because they think it would mean additional taxes upon them. We should not be influenced by either of these selfish motives, but look only to the welfare of our beloved country.

I do not hesitate to say that I have always believed, and I now believe, that the fellows who are the most able to do so should bear the bulk of the burdens of the Government. And I rejoice to know that within the last few weeks the United States Supreme Court has in the broadest way upheld the constitutionality of the Democratic income-tax law, thereby making it possible for us to compel the wealth of the country to bear its just share of the burdens of the Government—a thing that we have not been able to do heretofore.

I believe that it is possible for us to put this country upon a proper defensive basis without increasing the burden of taxation on the so-called "common people" of the country, but make those who own the principal bulk of the property to be protected pay the bulk of the cost of that protection. I would therefore favor increasing the income-tax rate, and I would then, in case an embargo is not placed on arms and ammunitions, levy a heavy excise tax upon such things, and if the stories we constantly hear be true—that is, that the munition factories are selling an average of a million dollars a day—we can raise all the money that we will need and can repeal the emergency war tax and thereby get rid of the annoying stamp tax. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have always opposed what is known as the big Navy program—that is, the building of a large number of big battleships.

Conditions have not changed my mind one whit on this point. I think that if the war in Europe has proven any one thing it is that the big $18,000,000 battleship is a thing of beauty but of no real practical use in time of war. Therefore I am not in favor of increasing our regular program on that item, but I do believe that this war has demonstrated the effectiveness of the submarine and aeroplane as potentially effective but inexpensive fighting machines.

I would build quite enough of such machines and other auxiliary crafts as may be necessary to round out our Navy; also build up a merchant marine; and would then strengthen our fortifications by building new forts wherever needed and equipping all of them with modern guns; prepare to mine our waters, and when this is done I do not believe that any nation can land an invading army on our shores. [Applause.]

Naturally this brings to our minds the imperative necessity of providing well-trained men to man these fighting machines. What I shall say about that will apply equally as well to the necessities for trained men to take charge of the land forces.

I am not in favor of a large standing Army. I can not bring myself to believe that, with our coast properly defended, we need a large standing Army.

I will not say that we should not increase our Regular Army somewhat or that we should not provide some plan to train our boys in the arts of war, but by no means should we take from the civil pursuits of life our young men and place them permanently in the military service. But I do believe that we ought to provide for more young men at our military and naval schools who can be equipped to go out and when necessary train our great citizen soldiery against the time when they may be needed for actual service.

The danger which I am seeking to warn against, Mr. Chairman, is that, once started on this program of "preparedness," we may not stop within the limits of reason. This, I plead, is a danger and we must carefully guard against it. Apropos to this I want to read a portion of a letter written me recently by a citizen of Texas, which expresses the matter admirably, as follows:

I believe that we ought to be prepared to defend our country against a foreign foe, but as to what amount of preparedness that will take, of course, I don't know. My only fear is that we will go so far that everyone will be thinking, talking, and acting "things military" until the day comes when we will on a slight excuse demand a chance to show our "preparedness." I wouldn't be afraid of this with Wilson in the White House, but I would be extremely afraid of it with such a man as Roosevelt. We can't count on Wilson to remain in the White House all the time, and isn't there danger that too much preparedness will get us into trouble if we should happen to have a "hasty" man as President? Can this preparedness wave, once started, be curbed or stopped at the right point? We, as a Nation, have always been inclined to boast that we were the most powerful Nation in the world—isn't there danger in our preparedness that we will go too far in our boasting? These are just some things that occur to me. You know, and I know, that there is a "bunch" of men in public office that would not hesitate to throw this country into war—not to defend the honor of this country but to protect a few "private rights." That has been demonstrated with Mexico. We people of Texas should be more deeply concerned with the Mexican problem than the people of any other State in the Union—yet while some of the Senators from the Eastern and Northern States were recently demanding intervention it was not even talked here.

I commend these wise suggestions to you for serious consideration.

Mr. Chairman, there is another matter that I want to mention before I close. Everyone knows the terrific struggle that the President has had in keeping this country out of war. I feel that the loyal, peace-loving people of our country will never tire in showing their gratitude to him for his heroic efforts in that regard. We also know that some of his hardest struggles in that connection have been occasioned by the persistent practice of thoughtless Americans in going into the danger zone in Mexico and crossing the Atlantic into the European war zone on vessels of the belligerent nations.

I want to enter my protest against such unwise practices. I feel that it is but little short of treason for our citizens to deliberately place themselves in situations of danger and thereby risk involving our Nation in war in order to avenge some outrage which may befall them as an inevitable consequence of their own rash conduct.

Do you tell me that such people have a right, under the law of nations, to go where they choose? Yes; I will grant that, as a matter of law, but I deny it as matter of right. No man, if he loves his country as he should, will do anything which will hazard the peace and lives of his fellow citizens.

I have no sympathy for any man who, from either the lure of gold or of pleasure, will place himself in a situation which may force his Nation to go to war in order to maintain its traditions or honor among the nations of the world.

In conclusion let me say let us all be as one man in preserving the peace of our beloved country, if we can, but ready to defend its integrity and honor, if we must. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. LLOYD. How much time did the gentleman use?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman consumed 20 minutes and yields back 10 minutes.

Mr. LLOYD. Does the gentleman desire to occupy time now or shall I occupy it on this side?

Mr. CARY. If the gentleman wishes, he can go ahead.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. OLNEY].

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, I am rather illy prepared to speak on this bill now, but I hurriedly gathered some notes together about an hour ago. When I was a boy my father was wont to say, "Little boys should be seen and not heard," and I believe perhaps the old Members of Congress look upon new Members of Congress in the same fashion. I also remember the wise words of the Speaker earlier in the session, when he said that this Congress should be an acting Congress and not a talking Congress. Furthermore, I shall bear in mind the splendid example of the floor leaders in the brevity of their arguments in debate, and therefore I do not intend to take up any more time in the discussion of this bill than the 10 or 12 minutes allotted to me. I regard the Hill bill as a good measure, a salutary measure, which can come to the instant relief of the dye situation as it exists in the United States to-day.

A grave situation faces us. When the Underwood-Simmons tariff bill was enacted, as I remember the clause concerning dyestuffs, there was an ad valorem duty of 30 per cent, or thereabouts. The Hill bill asks for an extra duty, a specific duty of 7½ cents a pound. This duty does not seem to be exorbitant. While the dyestuff product is distributed through various industries of the United States, it plays a most important part in the woolen industry and the textile industry. The textile industry produces a billion and a half dollars' worth of products. The woolen industry itself produces something like $550,000,000 in its manufactured products. Besides that, there is the hosiery industry to be considered, which produces about $200,000,000 worth of goods, and of these about half are woolen goods.

To-day we do not know at times what the prevailing color may be in dyes. That is largely set by fashion. A certain woman of prominence may walk up or down Fifth Avenue in New York or on some prominent street of Boston with a purple or a blue effect, and immediately that color is adopted by many of the fashionable dressmakers of this country as the prevailing fashion. To-day the predominating color seems to be black, or purple, or brown, and in connection with this argument I wish to show the Members of the House what might be considered Exhibit A. This is a sample of scoured Australian lamb's wool [exhibiting], one of the most expensive products in wool raised in the world to-day. Fortunately perhaps for this country we have not a fashion of pink teas and afternoon tennis parties where the prevailing costume may be white. Then, too, the prevailing fashion in men's goods is black, a rather difficult color to obtain to-day. This wool, in order to be equipped as a selling product, is obliged to go through a dyeing process. It may be pink, it may be purple, or it may be blue. These are some of the colors that are needed to-day in the United States [exhibiting] and are called fashionable colors. This exhibit "C," as we may call it, is natural gray wool [exhibiting]. There is an old saying that goes as follows: "There is a black sheep in every family," but unfortunately for the consuming American public there are not many black sheep in the United States. Of the 42,000,000 sheep which are grazing on our pastures and prairies to-day, it is safe to say that there is but 1 sheep out of 500 which produces gray wool. This would be a very important commodity in the present great crisis in the dyestuff situation to-day, if we had more gray wool. This natural black wool produced from the sheep goes into natural gray underwear.

And, speaking of the styles and how they predominate, it reminds me of a horse story. It is not as good as the dog story told by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VENABLE] in the House the other day, but I am sure it would make a horse laugh if he went back to the days of the twelfth century and learned how blinders came into fashion. It seems that a fashionable duke in England in the twelfth century had two horses. He was too poor to purchase another pair, and since these horses were taken blind and he could not afford to purchase others, he instituted then and there the fashion of blinders, and to this day the blinders have been an important part of the harness of the horse. I speak of this illustration as indicating to you the idiosyncrasies of some of the fashions to-day, and to show you why we can not understand why red, blue, or black in colors are the more predominating ones.

I consider this an emergency measure, and one that should be passed almost as quickly as the flood measure was the other day. As a wool merchant, connected with Richard Olney, 2d, & Co., of Boston, my partner and I visit a score or 30 mills during the year, and there is not one of those mills in operation to-day which does not demand and use dyestuffs to a considerable degree. It has perhaps been explained to you that aniline dyes can be manufactured from coal-tar products. The alizarine dyes come from a plant raised in Europe and produce some of the brighter colors. We are to-day getting a limited supply of logwood, and England did release from its Jamaican Islands a few days ago 4,700 tons for consumption in this country, but that is a mere drop in the bucket, Mr. Chairman, a mere bagatelle, of what we really need in dyestuffs.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. RAKER). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OLNEY. May I have three minutes more?

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Speaker, three years ago various manufacturing concerns appeared before the Ways and Means Committee, and while advocating a protection on the goods of production, deprecated any increase in the duty of dyestuffs. I am not apologizing for the selfish interests of these petitioners, but why should all suffer for the sins of a few? There seems to be along this aisle a dividing line, but it is only imaginary. It should be just as imaginary as the State line between New York and Pennsylvania or New York and Massachusetts. This is a bill which Republicans and Democrats can support side by side as an emergency measure.

I have here various letters from boot and shoe manufacturers, and I represent the largest boot and shoe manufacturing district, according to square miles, in the world, for Brockton, the principal city in my district, produced last year $53,000,000 in boot and shoe values, and dyestuffs play an important part in the tanning of the leather.

Just let me read from a letter of the M. A. Packard Co., Brockton, Mass., as follows:

DEAR SIR: Your letter of February 8 has been received, and in reply would say that the difficulty of getting dyestuffs has had a very serious effect upon the shoe-manufacturing industry, as dyes enter very largely into the production of leather such as is used in shoes.

* * * * * * *

An advance of from 100 to 1,000 per cent has taken place in the cost of dyes used in the manufacture of leather.

* * * * * * *

The situation is serious, and anything that can be done by Congress to relieve it and allow foreign dyes to enter this country would be of immense advantage to the shoe and leather industries as well as to all other industries in which dyes are used.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. OLNEY. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Can the gentleman tell how much that would increase the cost of a single pair of shoes?

Mr. OLNEY. I can not, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The percentage of increase in the cost of dyes per pound——

Mr. OLNEY. I can not tell you exactly, for I have not figured it, but I think it would be a very material increase.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It would be infinitesimal, would it not?

Mr. OLNEY. I think in a 1,000 per cent advance it would be noticeable.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will permit me, it was brought out in the hearings that the cost of dyeing a suit of clothes is less than 5 cents.

Mr. OLNEY. I would like also to bring in here, perhaps in answer to the gentleman, that there is danger of absolute extinction in the production of dyes in this country if the situation is not relieved immediately. And I have letters in my possession which show that hundreds of sets of woolen and cotton machinery are in danger of being shut down from such an extinction of that industry.

I will read:

It has been said that 1 barrel of dyes, worth before the war approximately $40, has been sold for over $1,000.

This comes from my office in Boston.

A gentleman operating 16 mills in six States, including New York State and the New England States, writes me:

I have been invited to put money into some new dyestuffs plants, but I would not put a dollar into the projects, as I know, without a very high tariff that would be here to stay for years, that Germany, when the war is over, would close them up.

And then there is a letter from the Madison Woolen Co., Madison, Me., from which I quote:

There should most certainly be a duty imposed on all dyestuffs imported that would make their production possible at a profit in this country.

We, of course, remember that the tariff goes back more than a hundred years, when Alexander Hamilton instituted the tariff to protect the infant American industries. Now the dyestuffs industry can be made prosperous and profitable, and will put into employment thousands and thousands of skilled mechanics in this country, but it needs instant operation. I ask you, Members of both sides of the House, to back this Hill measure for its favorable passage. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] has 23 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CARY] 35 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, if no one wishes to use the remainder of the time, I ask that the bill be read, at the conclusion of which I shall ask that the committee rise.

Mr. MANN. Would not the gentleman move to rise before that, with a view, if possible, of reserving time to be used on the bill when it comes up again? There might be some desire to discuss the provisions of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I would not object, with the understanding that the reserved time would be used in discussing the bill, but I thought it was understood that the general debate would be concluded to-day.

Mr. MANN. Well, unless an emergency arises, it would; but an emergency might arise two weeks from now. The time would not be extended.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. In discussing the bill, I would be in favor of a liberal discussion.

Mr. MANN. I say the time would not be extended over what is now provided. I had the impression that the gentleman was agreeable to the time being reserved.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. How much time, Mr. Chairman, remains?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-three minutes, controlled by the gentleman from Kentucky, and 35 minutes by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I move, Mr. Chairman, that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RAKER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8348) amending an act relative to a juvenile court in the District of Columbia, and had come to no resolution thereon.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill, H. R. 10484.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] will please take the chair until the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] comes.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10484, with Mr. RAKER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is recognized.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] 30 minutes.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, it has been stated by the members of the committee who have addressed the House on this Post Office appropriation bill that it has been carefully considered, section by section, in the committee room, and I think that I am correct when I say that it meets with the unanimous approval of the entire Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

In some very able speeches that we have already had by the honored chairman of our committee, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], and by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX], all of the provisions of this bill have been carefully and ably analyzed, and I do not know that it will really be profitable to the Members of this House for me to take up much time in a discussion of the different provisions of this bill.

But in the time allotted to me I want to address myself in particular to two or three of its numerous provisions. But before I start upon that I want to take a few minutes of time in referring to some of the remarks made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] in the three-hour speech which he made on the floor of this House in reference to the bill. I know that no member of the committee will dispute the learning of the gentleman from Minnesota and his thorough familiarity with matters pertaining to the Postal Service. He is one of the ablest members of the committee, and that part of his speech which was addressed to the real provisions of the bill was very illuminating; but a large part of it was taken up in an attack on the administration of our Democratic Postmaster General in particular, and a sort of a scattered shot at the whole

Democratic administration; and of that part of his speech I believe it might be said it was too thin to stick. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The long and laborious effort of the gentleman from Minnesota reminded me of the old fellow who went to town one day and imbibed somewhat too freely, and while in this condition decided that he wanted to give his wife a present, and so he went into a store and finally decided he would buy her a bolt of pink cheesecloth. He took it home and handed it as a peace offering to his good wife, and when she held it up to the light, in her disgust, she remarked very freely on its thinness and narrowness, when the old fellow interrupted to say, "But, my God, look at the length of it!" [Laughter.] Now, gentlemen of the House, there is one thing that we can say about the gentleman from Minnesota's attack on the Democratic administration—it was a long speech.

Among the first things that he took up in his speech was the deficit of the Post Office Department for the last fiscal year, ending June 30, 1915, which amounted to $11,333,308.97. He undertook to criticize the administration because of this deficit, and to use it as a means to neutralize the credit due the Democratic administration for the surplus of $3,800,000 that was shown for the fiscal year 1913 and $3,500,000 for the fiscal year 1914.

Now, let us see what the true facts are with reference to the deficit for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915. As is well known by the membership of this House, the European war broke out within one month after the beginning of the fiscal year 1915. The first month of that fiscal year was July, 1914, when no war was in progress. The receipts for that month were normal and showed an increase of more than 4 per cent over those of the month of July of the year before. But after the outbreak of the war, when the whole world was paralyzed to such an extent that even the stock exchanges closed down and the cotton exchanges closed down and the whole business world was upset, why, of course very naturally there was a falling off in the postal receipts, and the first month, August, showed a falling off of 1.20 per cent. This decline in postal receipts continued in an increasing degree for several months, until it reached its lowest point of decrease in November, 1914, when it fell, if I recollect correctly, to 5.71 per cent decrease over the month of November the year before. Then the pendulum swung to the other side of the ledger and the receipts began to increase, and this has gone on until they have now reached a point where the receipts indicate that a surplus will be shown for the present fiscal year instead of a deficit.

Since the speech of the gentleman from Minnesota on this bill I have taken the matter up with the Post Office Department and have secured the latest statistics, and I find that for the month of October, 1915, the receipts of 50 of the largest offices were $13,207,259.12, as against receipts of $12,751,040.63 for the same offices in the same month in 1914. I find for November that the receipts of these same 50 offices were $13,349,450.16, as against $11,316,311.40 in November, 1914. I find in December, the latest month for which statistics are available, that the receipts were $15,905,241.19, as against $14,251,934.90 in December, 1914. Therefore, for these three last months in 1915 the receipts of these 50 offices are $42,461,950.47, as against $38,319,286.93 for the same three months in 1914, which shows an increase of 10.81 per cent in the Postal Service. [Applause.]

Now, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] undertook to criticize the Postmaster General because, when this great war broke out, and the financial world was appalled at the impending tragedy, he endeavored to effect certain economies in his department to meet the exigencies of the situation. I know that in a great department like the Post Office Department, whose receipts this year will likely be more than $300,000,000, and with its many thousands of offices and employees, that it is difficult to administer it in such a way that some mistakes will not be made, and no doubt the Postmaster General did make some, and he would be more than human if he did not; but I do say that he would have been recreant to his duty as a public servant if he had not faced the situation as it was, and undertook to make the receipts as nearly as possible cover the expenditures. [Applause.]

We hear a great deal on the floor of this House, and especially from the Republican side, about economies of government; yet whenever an official does undertake to put in force some economies, immediately he becomes the target for their wholesale criticism.

If the people ever get the proper economies in the administration of this Government, they will have to rally to the support of officials who try to bring it about.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I will.

Mr. STEENERSON. I think I published the same figures substantially at the end of my speech, on page 2754, as those which have been read by the gentleman. I will say those figures were furnished by the Post Office Department. I notice that in the month of January, 1914, the increase over the previous month was only 1.1 per cent, whereas the department says that the normal increase is 7 per cent. The gentleman will also notice that there was a greater falling off in revenues in January, February, March, April, May, and June, 1914, than there was in July, which latter falling off they say was caused by the rumblings of the war. Can the gentleman explain that?

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman is going back two years ago for his figures and is dealing in ancient history. The figures that I have quoted are for October, November, and December, 1915, after we returned to normal conditions. And not only that, but these receipts indicate a remarkable degree of prosperity throughout the United States.

Mr. STEENERSON. That is true; but what causes the prosperity now? Is not the war in progress now just as much as it was in 1914?

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman well knows that the business world is recovering from the shock under which it labored at the outbreak of the great war, and has in a large measure readjusted itself to the changed conditions.

Mr. STEENERSON. Why does the gentleman condemn the war when the postal receipts fall, and not give it credit when the postal receipts rise?

Mr. BLACK. If the gentleman will give me time, I will show him. As I said a while ago, the outbreak of the European war was such a shock to the commercial world that the stock exchanges, fearing that Europe would dump its American securities upon the United States at a ruinous price, actually closed down.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; but the postal receipts were smaller in February and January, 1914, six months before the war broke out. Now, what was the cause of the hard times then? It could not have been the war, when the war did not exist. Was it not Democratic legislation?

Mr. BLACK. In dealing with this, I have already shown the gentleman that the receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, showed an actual surplus of $3,500,000 over the year before. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

RURAL FREE DELIVERY.

Now, I want to notice another criticism that was strongly pressed by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], and one that I have heard a great deal of from the other side of the House during this debate. That is with reference to the administration of the Rural Free Delivery Department of the Postal Service. At the very outset I want it to be borne in mind that that great department of the Postal Service has 43,877 routes, with a daily mileage of 1,073,099 miles, to deal with and handle. No one would expect that the department would be able to deal with all of those routes and not make some administrative mistakes; but I do say that the administration of that department—and the statistics will bear me out in the assertion—compares favorably with any administration of it under President Taft, President Roosevelt, or any other Republican President.

Now, when Mr. Blakslee, the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, went into office on the 1st of April, 1913, there were pending in the hands of the department and in the hands of inspectors 1,064 rural routes. There are now pending in the department and in the hands of inspectors 329 rural routes. There were also pending, at the same time, extensions of rural routes in the hands of the department and in the hands of inspectors to the number of 1,600, and there are now pending, in the hands of the department and in the hands of inspectors, only 211 of these extensions.

More than that, during this administration the Rural Free Delivery Service has been extended to 2,000,000 additional people in the United States, and plans are now under way to extend it to 750,000 more people. [Applause.]

There has been strong criticism of the department's policy of installing motor-car service on rural routes, and to be perfectly frank, I think myself that it is a mistake to install automobile delivery on any rural route, except where its mileage is over paved roads or the annual rainfall is so light that the roads do not get bad. I know it would be a most serious mistake to install automobile rural delivery in the congressional district which I have the honor to represent, where there are so many black-land and red-clay roads and such heavy annual rainfall. But this is a matter which Congress can and will correct by appropriate legislation, if those in charge of this service should insist on installing this automobile service where it is not feasible and practicable.

So I say that the administration of this department of Rural Free Delivery, which has been the subject of such severe criticism from Members on the other side, will compare favorably with any other administration of it since the inauguration of this branch of the Postal Service. If you deny it, gentlemen of the other side, I challenge you to get out your figures.

POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS.

In the fiscal year that closed on June 30, 1915, the number of depositors in the postal savings banks of the United States was 525,414, which was an increase in that one year of 136,903, or 35.2 per cent; and the amount on deposit at the end of said fiscal year was $65,684,708, which was a gain of $22,240,437 over the deposits of the year before, which, figured in percentage, was a gain of 51.2 per cent.

Not only that, gentlemen of the House, there are plans now under way for the further extension of this department, and this House has already, at this session, passed a bill which raises the limit that a depositor may place with these postal savings banks from $500, as at present, to $1,000, on which interest may be paid; and also provides that another $1,000 may be deposited without interest.

I pause here to say that, in my opinion, one of the great duties of our Government to-day is to encourage habits of economy and thrift among our people. Belgium before the war was known as a country without a pauper, and of the 10,000,000 voters in France at least nine-tenths are owners of Government bonds. There are 12,500,000 savings accounts in France. James J. Hill was not very far from right when he said:

> If you want to know whether you are going to be a success or failure in life you can easily find out. The test is simple and infallible. Are you able to save money at the time you are making plenty of it? If not, drop out. You will lose. You may not think it, but you will lose as sure as you live—the seed of success is not in you.

There are many people throughout our country to-day who are making remunerative salaries, but who are spending their substance in riotous living, and who in 20 years from now—and, perhaps, less time than that—will be cursing the Government because of their poverty and blaming some one else for their condition. We have too many people who adopt the philosophy of that son of rest who wrote:

> I wish I was a rock
> A settin' on a hill,
> And doin' nothin' all day long
> But just a settin' still.
> I wouldn't eat; I wouldn't sleep;
> I wouldn't even wash;
> I'd just set still a thousand years
> And rest myself, by gosh.

[Laughter and applause.]

I tell you that there is entirely too much disposition in the world to-day to penalize the man who in his youth and at the time of his best-earning capacity is industrious enough to get out and make money and has sense enough to save it after he has made it.

And I want to see the Government encourage in every possible way the individual thrift of its citizens and stop so much paternalistic talk. Break up these monopolies in restraint of trade and lay stress on the value of individual initiative. A policy of that kind will bring the proper results.

GUARANTY FUND.

We have in the Post Office appropriation bill a provision providing for the establishment of a postal guaranty fund to take the place of surety bonds which are now largely used by postal employees and contractors in securing the Government.

It is urged against this provision of the bill that it is putting the Government in the bonding business, and therefore it ought not to become a law. I would not favor putting the Government in the general bonding business any more than I would favor putting it into the fire insurance business, but the Government has already been placed in the post-office business by the Constitution of the United States and has been given a monopoly over that business. Therefore it has the right to protect itself against loss by a guaranty fund, and there is nothing revolutionary or socialistic in that. During the speech of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] he was asked by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] this question: "On what theory does the committee proceed in recommending this bonding indemnity feature, in making a charge against all the postal employees of the country for the misdeeds or defalcations of some other employees?" And the gentleman from Wisconsin, following this question up with several more along the same line, indicated his belief that the Government ought not to require security from its employees, and that it is big enough and rich enough to stand the loss itself.

Surely the gentleman would not take the position that a department of Government whose own receipts amount to $300,000,000 per annum, and which handles many millions more in the way of registered letters, money orders, merchandise, and other valuables, should do so without protecting itself from theft and embezzlement. It is impossible for the Government to tell in advance who these embezzlers and defaulters will be, and therefore it must take security from all employees. I want to call attention to this fact: This bill does not interfere with the employee who adopts the theory that every "tub ought to stand on its own bottom," because it expressly provides that if a postal employee wants to do it, he can file his security bond with personal sureties, as he has always filed it. If a rural carrier, for instance, wants to file a bond with personal sureties he can still do so, as he has always done; but if he does not want to go to the trouble of asking his friends to go upon his bond, he can pay the guaranty fund 75 per cent of the rates now charged by bonding companies on the bonds and save himself the trouble and necessity of filing a personal bond. Postmasters, letter carriers, and other postal employees can do the same.

Let us proceed further and see how this method has worked out where it has been tried. In the Dominion of Canada they put this method into effect in 1899. They have collected under this system, if I recollect correctly, something over $311,000 up to the end of the year 1915. In that period of time they have paid out about $57,000, leaving a balance in the Treasury to the credit of the guaranty fund of something more than $254,000, which they now have, and it promises to soon reach that point where the interest on this fund will be sufficient to pay all losses, and assessments will be no longer necessary. There is nothing socialistic or evil in this method. It is very similar to the method that we have in Texas to guarantee bank deposits. We have in Texas what is known as the State bank-guaranty law, and under that law the bank that holds to the principle that "every tub must stand on its own bottom" can still do so and file a satisfactory bond with the commissioner of banking and insurance; but if the bank does not want to go to the trouble and expense of making this bond, it can contribute to the guaranty fund. And all of the banks that I know anything about have contributed to the guaranty fund, and I do not know of any bank in Texas that has filed a bond to guarantee its deposits, although it may do so under the law. This system of guaranty of bank deposits in Texas has been a pronounced success, and since its operation no depositor in the State of Texas has ever lost a single cent in a State bank failure; and I would like to see the time come, if you will pardon this digression, when the bank deposits of our national banks are under a similar guaranty law, because I believe that when a depositor puts his money into a financial institution chartered by the United States Government he ought to have the absolute assurance it will be there for him when he comes to get it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Of course, I am glad to state that the percentage of national bank failures is very small, but when one does occur sometimes the savings of a lifetime are swept away in the unexpected disaster.

The United States Government itself whenever it deposits a single dollar requires that it shall be absolutely secured and that all elements of risk be eliminated, and the private citizen ought to have the same guaranty.

RAILWAY MAIL PAY.

Perhaps the most important provision of this bill is that which relates to railway mail pay, and before entering upon a discussion of this subject I will say I do not share in the belief of some that the railroads are overpaid for carrying the mail at the present time. The reason that I do not share that opinion which is held by some is because I do not believe the figures and the investigations which have been made bear out the theory that the railroads are really overpaid. In 1900 the total postal receipts of the United States were $102,354,579. In 1915, 15 years later, they were $287,248,165, or an increase of 181 per cent in the amount of total postal receipts. The railway mail pay in 1900 was $37,315,724, and in 1915 it was $59,576,288, or an increase of 60 per cent in the total amount paid for carrying the mail.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. RAINEY). The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. So, Mr. Chairman, under the unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I will continue my argument along the same line that I was proceeding when my time expired.

Wages of railway postal clerks were $8,839,767 in 1900 and were $28,408,243 in 1915, an increase of 221 per cent.

Cost of service in post offices, including pay of employees, in 1900 was $51,214,498, and was $139,936,546 in 1915, an increase of 173 per cent.

The cost of inland transportation of the mail, not including that by rail, was $7,794,212 in 1900 and $17,337,637 in 1915, an increase of 122 per cent.

So in the face of these figures I do not think that the pay of railroads for carrying the mail under the present law, except in perhaps exceptional cases, is excessive. In fact, the commissions who have investigated this question in the past seem to have concluded that the railroads were not overpaid for this service.

"Well," some one will ask, "why the change?" And to that I answer, that the cost of weighing the mails under the present system is expensive and annoying, it costing the Government each year $250,000 to weigh the mails.

Also the system lacks elasticity to meet changing conditions and fluctuation of traffic, that with the growth of the parcel post have been frequent and far-reaching. Computation under the present law is a complex process, little understood and productive of endless and vexatious disputes.

A joint committee was appointed by Congress in 1912, composed of Hon. Jonathan Bourne of Oregon, Hon. Harry A. Richardson, of Delaware; Hon. John H. Bankhead, of Alabama; Hon. James T. Lloyd, of Missouri; Hon. William E. Tuttle, of New Jersey; and Hon John W. Weeks, of Massachusetts, to investigate this whole question, and after an exhaustive investigation extending over a period of 18 months the committee reported August 31, 1914, and in that report said:

We have spent nearly two years in this study, have conscientiously and to the best of our ability endeavored to perform the duties placed upon us by Congress, in its creation of our committee.

We feel confident we have worked out a sound, scientific, and simple plan. We believe our suggested rates are certainly not too high from a governmental standpoint, though they may be too low from a railroad standpoint.

They are as near equitable as we can demonstrate by means of the data available. We herewith respectfully submit a concrete bill, so correlated that it should be adopted in its entirety. The elimination of any of its features or modifications of same will, in our opinion, materially affect the benefits incident to the adoption of the bill as a whole.

The rates suggested by this Bourne committee are the same as we have fixed in this bill we are now considering, and for a full railway post-office car, are 21 cents per car foot mile, for a 30-foot apartment car, 11 cents per car foot mile; and for a 15-foot apartment car, 6 cents per car foot mile. Also in addition to this pay for space, the bill makes provision for initial and terminal rates as follows: For each 60-foot car the bill provides $2 as an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip.

For each 30-foot apartment car, $1 as an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip, and 50 cents as an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 15-foot apartment car. For storage cars this bill provides the same rates as are provided for full railway post-office cars.

Now, I will give a concrete illustration of how this bill will work in its administration:

The Iron Mountain Railroad runs a fast mail train from St. Louis to Texarkana, Tex., a distance of 494 miles.

Taking as an illustration a full railway post-office car of 60 feet in length, the pay would be as follows: One hundred and three dollars and seventy-four cents plus $4 for initial and terminal charges, making $107.74 in all for the trip.

The pay for the car returning would be the same, whether it was as heavily loaded or not. This would make $215.48 for the trip of this car. Nothing complex about it, perfectly simple, and no room for dispute. The congressional committee that made an exhaustive study of the matter have said that the pay will be absolutely adequate and compensatory. But there is one feature of the bill to which the railroads have been very strenuously objecting which I think has not thus far been discussed by members of the committee who have spoken. That particular feature is this: That rates in this proposed law are left discretionary with the Postmaster General.

This is no new departure.

In every law enacted by Congress on the subject of railway mail pay since Congress first legislated, 77 years ago, in regard to the carriage of mails on railroads, July 7, 1838, the Postmaster General has been given free and full power to contract with a railroad for the carriage of mails at any rate within the maximum rates named in the several laws, if he should be able to do so.

There is nothing wrong about this provision; it is wise and equitable and necessary to the proper administration of the law.

To share in mail transportation between competitive points many railroads enter into equalization agreements with the Post Office Department, under which they perform service for less than the maximum pay under the law. Now, for instance, take the Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railroad between Chicago and St. Louis. In order to share in transportation of mails between Chicago and St. Louis it voluntarily accepts $137,254.03 per annum, whereas if no discretion were left to the Postmaster General and it was mandatory on him to pay the maximum rates, the Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railroad would be paid for carrying the mails between these two points the sum of $157,631.18, or 12.93 per cent more than it is now paid for this same service. Should the Government have to pay this extra amount, when the railroad company is entirely willing to carry it for the other amount? And there are a number of other instances of the same kind to which I could cite you and give you figures. The railroad companies also in their protest have this to say: "The Moon bill proposes a 'space plan' of pay to the railroads for carrying the mails and parcel post.

"This means that the mail pay of the railroads is to stand still, while the tonnage carried in the mail cars is to be increased indefinitely."

Now, it is elementary that as the volume of mail increases the space used in carrying it will increase, and for every foot of additional space that the Government uses it will pay the rates prescribed in this bill.

And to make certain that no injustice would be done the railroads under the operation of this proposed law we have provided:

The representatives of railroads with an aggregate mileage of at least 51 per cent of the mileage of railroads carrying mail may request the Interstate Commerce Commission to make an investigation of the justice and reasonableness of rates then in effect, grant hearings to parties in interest, and report to Congress, at the earliest practicable date thereafter, the results of such investigation, making specific findings as to whether the rates fixed herein should be increased or decreased; and, if either, how much; and for the purpose of such investigations the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have all powers which it is now authorized to exercise in the investigation of the reasonableness of rates, and the Postmaster General shall supply such information regarding the mail service as may be requested by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

And now, in conclusion, I respectfully submit that our committee has approached this whole question with a desire to do absolute justice to both the railroad companies and the people; and, secure in the confidence that we have done so, the matter is now in the hands of this House for its approval or rejection.

We believe you will not hesitate to approve the bill.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, a great deal is being said, with more or less information on the subject, of "preparedness," an undefined term, which is supposed to have reference to the spasmodics indulged in by one side and the niggardly parsimony on the other—almost criminal parsimony—about making judicious provision to put ourselves in readiness to prepare easily and rapidly in case of war or threatened war with any foreign nation. I am no "Sir Oracle" of any degree, nor do I assume to be the mouthpiece of the administration, but I have an editorial from a good old Democratic paper, the Newnan Herald, in the district I represent, which is so sensible and true that I shall conclude these remarks by giving it to the committee and to the country. The recent resignation of the Secretary of War has rather clarified the situation and made manifest to all slanderers, as well as patriots, the true attitude of the administration. The dispute between the one-time Secretary and the President seems to have been to this effect, that the Secretary wanted to contend with the President as to which one of them should control Congress. The President declined the contest, correctly holding that the Executive ought not to attempt the control of Congress. He was content to submit to Congress his views, in compliance with the Constitution. He was also content to leave the result with the wisdom of Congress, confident that the able Committees on Military and Naval Affairs in the two Houses will give due weight to his suggestions, and all other considerations and propositions, and will bring out a bill commensurate with the necessities of the situation.

The known wisdom and integrity of the chairmen of those committees and their able associates give sufficient assurance that they will avoid hysteria and jingoism on one side and parsimonious and criminal negligence on the other, and that the result will be adequate, sane, and proper provision to meet the situation as it exists or threatens to exist. Such provision will be followed by ample provision for revenue. The great and patriotic chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], and his able associates will see to it that the proper sinews of war are forthcoming in the wisest and best way.

The following editorial is worthy of your attention:

[From the Newnan Herald, Friday, Feb. 11.]

A QUESTION OF MEANS.

There is nothing unprecedented or un-American or in the least degree alarming in the proposed increase in the United States Army and Navy.

This country was born in battle. For many years after the formation of the Republic it was understood that the American citizen was also at least a quasi soldier. The use of firearms was general, if not universal. Good marksmanship was a manly and much coveted accomplishment. There was a rifle or a shotgun in practically every home, and boys learned to shoot as soon as they learned how to plow. Game was more plentiful than now, and the proximity of the Indians led to the use of weapons and such training as would make every man a good soldier on short notice. The military spirit and practice of the early days have an historic memorial in the subdivisions of the counties preserved to this day in Georgia. These were, and are still, called "militia districts." These districts were laid off originally, not with reference to the territory they covered, but with reference to the number of men that could be mustered. Every able-bodied citizen was expected, if not actually required, to do militia duty. The district commanders were captains, the county commanders were colonels, and those above these officers were generals. The governor of the State was the commander in chief of the army and navy of Georgia. This militia system existed in Georgia up to the beginning of the Civil War, though it was not so well and rigidly enforced as in earlier days. And other States had similar systems.

Besides the State militia there was the Standing Army; also the Navy, and the two academies where officers were trained for both branches of the service. The proposed increase in our trained military forces is but a return to an order of things that marked the first stages of our national history.

Nobody can reasonably question that we lack at present an adequate Army for our protection. Our only hope of immunity is in the belief that no nation will make war on us. The revelations of the past year and a half are quite sufficient to show that such a hope is not well founded.

The real question involved is as to the cost of the proposed increase. How the Government can raise the necessary means to enlarge our Army and Navy is the real issue before Congress and the Nation.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make an accurate record of certain correspondence between Mr. S. S. Menken, of New York, president of the National Security League, and myself, as follows:

JANUARY 21, 1916.

S. STANWOOD MENKEN, Esq.,
National Security League,
New Willard Hotel, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MENKEN: Before the Committee on Rules of the House of Representatives, a few days ago, a Member of Congress read from a St. Louis newspaper a statement to the effect that you are counsel for some concern engaged in the manufacture of munitions of war. Unless I mistook the bearing of the Congressman's words, I think that he meant to intimate that your motives in advocating an adequate defense of the United States might not be entirely patriotic.

I am writing to you to find out the truth in this matter.

Of course I know perfectly well that your position as counsel, if you are counsel, for a concern that makes munitions of war can not possibly have led you to undertake and persist in the prolonged, exacting, and superbly effective work which you are doing in behalf of our national defense. It is just as absurd to attribute unpatriotic motives to you as it would be to attribute them to me because I happen to be a trustee for some General Electric stock of which my wife and married daughter are beneficiaries.

Very truly, yours,

A. P. GARDNER.

FEBRUARY 1, 1916.

Hon. AUGUSTUS P. GARDNER,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN GARDNER: Referring to your letter of January 21, I would say that the statement referred to as having been published in St. Louis to the effect that I am counsel to a concern engaged in the manufacture of munitions for war is untrue.

Since the statement was made our firm has, at the request of some out-of-town lawyers, formed a company which, I understand, may endeavor to make some form of castings. Personally I have never talked with people interested in this matter, even indirectly, and never heard of them until two or three days ago.

I might also say that I have held, as trustee, some stock of a shipbuilding and lumber company on the Pacific coast, and that my firm acted as counsel for them in a small way, filing the reports in New Jersey. Upon my attention being called to this matter about a month ago, I tendered my resignation as trustee, which was accepted.

My partners tell me that we have in the corporation side of our office acted as counsel for some concerns which may make automobiles, engines, or certain steel supplies, but this work has come to the office from clients who we represented for years and whose business normally was not such as could be in any way associated with anything used in connection with war. At no time have any of the clients of the office ever suggested that I interest myself in national defense for their benefit, nor would they dare to do so.

The real source of my interest in national defense arises from the circumstance that, having heard Mr. Asquith speak in London and witnessed during the first month of the war the terrible results of England's unpreparedness, I then realized, in a measure, what would happen to our own country, and decided, upon reading your remarks in Congress, to investigate the facts.

The circumstance that I was the leader in forming the Security League was an expression of the knowledge on my part that no large result could be accomplished in this country except through a broad national organization, and the whole impulse has been a disinterested one to remedy the conditions which have been disclosed.

Very truly, yours,

S. STANWOOD MENKEN.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE].

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I realize that a great deal of time has been devoted to this measure and I, too, realize the importance of the bill itself. We are treating with one of the largest appropriations that this House has to deal with this year, and, besides that, we are dealing with the railroad situation of the Nation and also with more than 110,000 employees of the Government. The committee, Mr. Chairman, of which I have the honor to be a member, have given perhaps as much attention to every matter of detail in this bill as has or will be given on any subject to come before us, and, knowing this to be the fact, I for one believe that we have reported a bill for which any Member of this House can well afford to vote, because in it we have not only protected the interests of the people of the United States at large but we have attempted to put into law the things that are for the benefit of the employees of the Government. Also, Mr. Chairman, we have dealt with this great question of railway mail pay that is agitating the minds of the people all over this country. This question of railway mail pay has been gone into thoroughly by the senior members of the committee, and I will not attempt to tire you with the figures which I have upon this all-important question. There has been much said in the way of criticism by those who believe that their interests have not been protected in this bill; but I contend, sir, that this bill has been treated fairly, as the members have had their minds open in order to receive all sides of the question. I want, Mr. Chairman, at this time to pay my tribute to the chairman of the committee, who upon this question gave such able assistance to the other members of the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, in a speech on last Tuesday on this floor the chairman of the committee has been quoted as saying that a powerful railroad lobby was working against this bill. The inference to be drawn from the critics of that speech would lead us to believe that he intended to make this House believe that other than legitimate means were being used to defeat it. I do not, Mr. Chairman, believe that that was his intention, but let me say this, that I, too, believe that there has been a lobby at work against the interests of this bill. Before this House came into session, way back in the summer of 1915, the Members of this House were receiving resolutions and documents from many commercial bodies and business houses of the country, praying of the Congress that the railroads be dealt with fairly, and many of those resolutions went so far as to criticize the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, which up to that time had not been appointed. That, Mr. Chairman, is sufficient for me to realize that this lobby was at work upon this question. But with all of that your committee met the question fairly and have honestly reported a bill which, I believe, is in the interests of all the people of the Nation. True it is that the bill does not meet the wishes of some of the railroad magnates of the country; but your committee, Mr. Chairman, were serving as the representatives of the people of the Nation and were not serving on that committee as representatives of the railroads of the country. And so, Mr. Chairman, this bill on the question of railway mail pay, I submit, is a fair bill and one which, if it proves not to be fair, provides means in the bill by which the parties interested, the railroads and the Post Office Department, can appeal from after it has become the law.

Another important measure is the bonding question. The question has been raised whether the United States should go into the surety and bonding business. I do not believe there is a Member of the House who wants to see the United States engage in any business against any legitimate business of the United States. The matter before us was important. We had the facts and figures to show that the Government had been defrauded of its rights by some of the bonding companies of this Nation, and we had in mind the protection of the interests of the people of the United States at large, so we reported the bill that is now before you, which you have heard so much of during this debate. Many other matters came before us. I said we were dealing with over 110,000 employees of this great Government of ours, employees in the service who are giving their entire lives in the interests of the Nation, and the questions that confronted us were of so much importance that we felt it our duty to report into law that which was supposed to be the law in the past. It seems, Mr. Chairman, to have been the habit of this department to construe the law as they felt it might affect them and not the men whom the law was intended to relieve. That has been going on for many years; not this administration alone, but other administrations in the past, and they treated the men in a manner that no private corporation would treat their employees. I contend, Mr. Chairman, that the provisions placed in bills affecting the welfare and interests of men in the Post Office Department were placed there to advance their interests. Let me suggest, for instance, one. A few years ago this Congress passed an act paying the extra men, the substitutes, in the carrier service and the clerical service 35 cents and 40 cents an hour for extra work, but through the cleverness of some officials they established a rate of $800 a year for substitutes in the Department of the Post Office, paying them at the rate of 29½ cents an hour instead of the 35 and 40 cents as specified and intended by the Congress. Your committee has attempted to modify that. Your committee has attempted to tell the department what the intention of Congress was.

Another question that I believe is of as much importance as any that will come before this Congress this year is the matter of the old men in the service of the Post Office Department and the other departments of the Government. Something has been said here upon the question of demotion of carriers in the large cities.

Under date of February 4, 1915, a communication was mailed to postmasters from the office of the First Assistant Postmaster General relative to the assignment of letter carriers to collection duty. The instructions contained in the communication were that the maximum salary to be paid collectors would be $1,000 per annum, and that the letter carriers in the lower grades should be assigned to collection service and the carriers above that grade should be assigned to delivery districts. In large post offices it was found to be impractical to follow out the instructions contained in the communication from the department, as a large number of the carriers assigned to collection duty had been men employed in the service for a number of years, and on account of failing sight and other causes they were better qualified to perform collection service, and if assigned to delivery duty that they could not make the schedules required of them unless given an opportunity to study the schemes and learn the routes and become accustomed to the short cuts for making the quickest deliveries, all of which would require a considerable length of time. In fact it was like sending an old man to learn a new business.

In order to carry the instructions of the department into effect, local postal officials notified the collectors to make application for delivery districts with the understanding that if they did not make good at once that they would not be retransferred to collections routes but would be recommended for removal from the service. The effect of the order was to arouse such a storm of protest that the matter was taken up and discussed in the last Congress.

When the Post Office appropriation bill failed of passage a special resolution was passed in both Houses continuing the appropriations that were in effect for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and made them available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, to the same extent in detail, and under the same conditions, restrictions, and limitations as provided for in the appropriation bill of 1915. The joint resolution also contained a provision that letter carriers assigned to collection service whose salaries were reduced during the past year through no delinquency or misconduct on their part, should be restored to their former grades. It was the evident intention of Congress that no discrimination should be made against letter carriers assigned to delivery or collection duty. Had not this been the intent of Congress, there would have been no reason for placing the special provision in the joint resolution.

Notwithstanding this, however, the department mailed a letter to postmasters, under date of March 29, 1915, drawing attention to the provision contained in the special resolution, of which the following is a copy:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, March 29, 1915.

POSTMASTER: Referring to the letter of this bureau of February 4, 1915, relative to the readjustment of the assignment of letter carriers to collection duty, I desire to call your attention to the resolution of Congress making appropriations for the Postal Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, which provides that letter carriers assigned to collection service whose salaries have been reduced during the past fiscal year through no delinquency or misconduct on their part, shall be restored to their former grades.

In all cases where the carriers are inefficient by reason of being incompetent to perform the work required on an average delivery route, they should be given notice in writing, setting forth their delinquencies and giving them an opportunity to show cause why they should not be reduced.

The department desires that the instructions of the letter of February 4, 1915, shall be carried out by a reassignment of carriers, placing carriers of the lower grades on collection duty and assigning carriers of the higher grades now on collection duty to delivery duty as far as may be practicable.

DANIEL C. ROPER,
First Assistant.

It will be noted in this connection that the department showed the postmasters a way to reduce the collectors by filing charges against them for being incompetent or inefficient in the event that they could not serve an average delivery route. It will be noted also, in the last paragraph, that "the department desires that the instructions of the letter of February 4, 1915, shall be carried out."

In large cities this readjustment worked a severe hardship on letter carriers, as it resulted in transferring men from one station to another in order to provide them with delivery routes. In many instances the carriers were transferred so far away from their homes that they were compelled to move their families or else get up at an unseemly hour in the early morning in order to make connections with the street cars that would permit of their reporting to their stations on time. This order has not been of any benefit to the Postal Service, but, on the contrary, it has had the effect of compelling men who desired to maintain the salaries they had been getting to apply for one kind of work where, for one reason or another, their efficiency could be used to better effect in another line of service. Many competent men had been kept on collection routes for years, through no fault of their own, for such a long period of time that they had become accustomed to the work and were perfectly contented. Many of these letter carriers have been on collection duty for such a long while that they could not do justice to a delivery district without months of experience, and under no condition could they perform the schedules laid out on delivery routes from the beginning of their assignment. These men have been compelled to suffer a reduction in salary by asking to be kept on collection service, as they would be subject to charges of incompetency and inefficiency if they applied for and were assigned to delivery districts and could not make good from the beginning.

The cost of living keeps mounting skyward, and it is a grave problem for men to solve who are trying to raise their families properly on the meager salaries that are paid to letter carriers even in the maximum grade. To reduce the salaries of these men in the manner in which it has been done has not only worked a severe hardship on them and compelled them to change their living conditions, but the manner in which it has been done is not in keeping with the principles of our Government. The order has done more to demoralize the Postal Service than any other act of the present post-office officials excepting the recommendations of the Postmaster General to the third session of the Sixty-third Congress, when he wished to deprive the employees of every piece of beneficial legislation that has been enacted by the Congress for 20 years. It has kept the employees in a state of fear and discontent, and to that extent it has reduced their efficiency.

The order was promulgated for the purpose of reducing the old men who are assigned to collection service, although this statement is not admitted by the officials. A man who has had any experience in the letter-carrier service, or any supervisory official in a post office, knows full well that the younger men render the best service on delivery districts, and the older men, whose sight begins to fail them and who can not distribute the mail as expeditiously as they formerly could and whose limbs are beginning to stiffen from years of toil in all kinds of weather, but who are methodical in their habits, render the most efficient service as collectors.

I confess, Mr. Chairman, that when that matter was brought to my attention I felt that a great wrong was done to the ment in the service who had given the best years of their lives for their Government. Men who had served 40 years, yes, men who had served 50 years, were demoted from $1,200 to $1,000 a year, without any excuse except they had grown old and were no longer the active, able men they had been in the past, and they were given in return an opportunity to become collectors in the service or of being retired entirely.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that there is a Member of this Congress who wishes to treat the old men of the service in that manner. Your committee, with all the facts before it, believe, as many of the Members of this Congress believe, that something should be done to alleviate this situation, and your committee therefore has reported a section of this bill that places back in their standing these old, true, faithful, honest servants of the Government who have been demoted from their positions of $1,200 to $1,000 a year.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. TAGUE. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Would it not be much better to have a general retirement law under which all the old employees could feel safe that they would be taken care of?

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad the gentleman brought that question up. I have before me a bill introduced by me that is now before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads asking for the retirement of all members of the Post Office Service who have been in the employ of it over 25 years and have reached the age limit of 65.

The bill is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10130) to retire postal employees on an annuity after 25 years' service.

Be it enacted, etc., That any employee of the Post Office Service who has served the United States of America in the Post Office Department for 25 years or more, or has reached the age of 65 years, shall, at his or her request, be retired from service on an annuity of one-half of his or her average annual salary, pay, or compensation for the past five years, but no annuity to exceed $600.

SEC. 2. That the Postmaster General may at any time retire any employee of said department when in his judgment said employee is disabled for useful service in the Postal Service and shall place upon a pension roll any employee of the Postal Service whom a physician, duly authorized by the Postmaster General, certifies in writing to be permanently disabled, mentally or physically, by injuries sustained, through no fault of such employee, in the actual performance of duty, from further performance of duty as an employee of said department who has performed faithful service continuously for not less than 15 years.

SEC. 3. That every employee so retired shall annually receive an annuity of one-half the amount of his or her average salary, pay, or compensation for the past five years, but no such annuity to exceed $600.

SEC. 4. That the Postmaster General be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to include in his annual estimate a sum sufficient to pay all annuities and pensions which may incur from this act.

It is a matter of record in this Congress that every Postmaster General for many years back, and I have the records in my hand, has asked Congress in their reports to establish some fund or some condition so that they could take care of the superannuated employees of the Government.

The Postmaster General's report for 1909 states:

[Extracts of reports of Postmasters General and their assistants on the subject of superannuation.]

RETIREMENT OF SUPERANNUATED EMPLOYEES.

In recent years the subject of making provision for the retirement of superannuated employees in the civil service has received much consideration. It is believed that the interests of the employees and of the Government alike demand legislation to this end.

The work of the Postal Service, like that of every great business institution, public or private, requires special training. Years of experience are necessary for the attainment of a high degree of proficiency in the discharge of the duties devolving on postal employees. The department's policy is, therefore, to recruit its force from young men and to retain them until such time as their usefulness is impaired by advancing age.

In view of the increased cost of living the salaries paid are barely sufficient to enable the employees to meet current needs, and the opportunity to make provision for old age is small. These conditions suggest the adoption of measures that will insure Government employees against want after they pass the period of active service. Private business establishments in this and foreign countries find that such a course brings practical returns in the increased loyalty and zeal of employees.

Experience has shown that in default of such provision administrative officers hesitate to recommend the dismissal or the reduction in salary of superannuated employees who have spent their lives in the Government service. The drain on the national finances by their retention at full pay after they have become incapacitated for efficient service is far greater than would be the cost of a reasonable system of civil pensions.

The First Assistant Postmaster General for the same year, in his report, states:

A RETIREMENT FUND FOR SUPERANNUATED EMPLOYEES.

The question of retiring superannuated employees on a pension has confronted the executive departments and has been discussed in Congress for many years. The present law prohibits the maintenance of a civil pension list and makes it the duty of executive officers to drop from the rolls all employees who are permanently incapacitated for performing service. This law, however, is most difficult of enforcement, and it is undoubtedly a fact that there are many employees in the Postal Service who should be retired on account of age and physical infirmities. Many of these men have spent their lives in the service. On account of the long hours and exacting nature of their duties they have not been able to add to their meager savings by outside employment nor to lay up a competence for old age. To remove them from the service for incompetency when their period of active usefulness has passed is in contravention of the spirit of our institutions. Good administration and humanity alike demand that some provision be made to care for these veterans of the service when overtaken by old age or disability.

The First Assistant Postmaster General, in his report for 1910, says:

PENSIONS FOR SUPERANNUATED EMPLOYEES.

Nearly every country of importance makes some provision for pensioning its civil employees when they are overtaken by old age and many of the large corporations in this country have devised a similar plan for the retirement of their aged employees. From the standpoint of economy alone it would seem that this Government should do likewise. In the Postal Service, on account of the long hours, the small salaries, and the exacting nature of the duties performed, the employees rarely are able to lay up a competence for old age. It is hoped, therefore, that Congress will take action looking to the retirement in some suitable manner of its superannuated employees.

The Postmaster General, in his report for 1911, says:

PENSIONS FOR SUPERANNUATED EMPLOYEES.

Almost without exception foreign nations provide for the pensioning of civil-service employees when they become superannuated. Large corporations in this country are rapidly adopting the same principle in the retirement of their aged employees. On business grounds, if for no other reason, the Government should do likewise.

While the compensation of postal employees has been considerably increased during the last few years, it is hardly more than sufficient to meet necessary living expenses and consequently does not permit the putting aside of any considerable savings against old age. It is believed that a civil pension based on length of employment should be granted by the Government. Benefits to the service far outweighing the expense of such pensions would undoubtedly result.

The First Assistant Postmaster General, in his report for the same year, says:

PENSIONS FOR SUPERANNUATED EMPLOYEES.

Nearly every country of importance makes some provision for pensioning its civil employees when they are overtaken by old age, and many of the large corporations in this country have devised a similar plan for the retirement of their aged employees. From the standpoint of economy alone it would seem that this Government should do likewise. In the Postal Service, on account of the long hours, the small salaries, and the exacting nature of the duties performed, the employees rarely are able to lay up a competence for old age.

At post offices of the first class the employees number about 50,000, and less than 1,200 of this number have reached the age of 65 or more, many of whom are in nowise superannuated. It is believed, therefore, that less than 2 per cent of the employees of classified post offices would be retired under a pension system.

In the Post Office Service a large sum of money accrues annually from the lapsed salaries of employees absent without pay, where no substitute is employed or where the substitute receives less than the salary of the absent clerk or carrier and also on account of failure to fill vacancies immediately or where the force is reduced temporarily during the dull season when vacancies occur. The employees themselves, in a measure, contribute to this fund, since the absence of regular employees throws additional burdens on those remaining on duty. This fund is more than sufficient to cover the cost of pensions for the superannuated employees among the 60,000 clerks and carriers at first and second class post offices. There is another source of revenue that might properly be used to constitute a pension fund, and that is the money turned into the Treasury each year from money orders issued and never presented for payment.

The Postmaster General, in his report for 1912, says:

PENSIONS FOR SUPERANNUATED EMPLOYEES.

Civil pensions, based on length of service, should be granted to postal employees when they become superannuated. It is likely that the expense of such a system would be more than offset by gains in efficiency. Although the compensation of postal employees has been considerably increased during the last few years, it is still insufficient to permit adequate savings against old age. Foreign nations pension their aged employees as do also many corporations, and on business grounds, if for no other reason, the Government should do likewise.

The First Assistant Postmaster General, in his report for 1912, says:

INJURED AND SUPERANNUATED EMPLOYEES.

In the Postal Service the employees rarely are able to accumulate savings, and the injury of an employee in the line of duty, necessitating his absence without pay or resulting in death, is a serious hardship to his family. The Government should take the lead in dealing fairly with employees who are injured while in the performance of duty and those who, when burdened with years and worn with faithful service, are forced to relinquish their positions because no longer able to work.

The First Assistant Postmaster General, in his report for 1914, says:

SUPERANNUATION.

It is said that the loss sustained by the Government on account of superannuation aggregates many millions annually. A careful canvass of first and second class post offices seems to indicate that this loss is probably less proportionately in the Postal Service than elsewhere. Alertness, dexterity, quickness of hand and eye, and other qualities of youth are peculiarly required for the performance of post-office work and tend of themselves to assist in reducing superannuation in the service. However, superannuation is an important problem in properly reorganizing the Post Office Service, and the increasing volume of parcel-post traffic accentuates the need for an early and definite solution.

Some postmasters refrain for humanitarian reasons from recommending demotions and removals in accordance with the declining efficiency of employees. The result to some extent is that tenure of office in the Government service does not now depend on the law nor on the uniform needs of the service, but upon the varying temperaments of the postmasters and their varying conceptions of their public duty. This condition is wrong and works injustice to the employees and loss to the Government.

The First Assistant Postmaster General, on March 1, 1915, in a communication to Senator BANKHEAD, which was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 4, said that—

Superannuation, however, remains a pressing and urgent problem, and a practical plan for dealing with it effectually should be accepted and advocated.

I have also, Mr. Chairman, an article published by the First Assistant Postmaster General dealing with this important question. There are to-day in the Post Office Service of this Government less than 1,500 men who have reached the age of 65 years or more. There were 1,331 actually when this document was published, but there are 1,500 now. Of this number there are less than one-third of them 70 years of age. If this Congress will support a bill, the bill which I have read, establishing an annuity of not more than $600 a year and half pay for all of these employees, the Government will be richer and it will be a gainer by the passage of it. Thirteen hundred and thirty-one men, or 1,500 at the most, at $600 a year will cost this Government $900,000 a year. Fifteen hundred men to take their places at $800 a year, which is the entering salary for an employee of the Government, is $1,200,000 a year. We are now paying these 1,500 men $1,800,000 a year. So it will cost the Government of the United States less than $300,000 a year to establish an annuity fund that will give to these old, faithful servants of the Government some recompense in their old age. Many of the big corporations of the United States have established these funds, and it is a question that is agitating the mind of every employer of labor. I do not believe that the Government intends that old men who have given their all to their Government shall be cast aside and thrown into the scrap heap of humanity when they reach the age when they can no longer serve their Government. But that is the condition that prevails now in this Government of ours. Old men who have walked the streets day and night, and in sunshine and in rain and all kinds of weather have worked in the interest of the Government, are to-day in their old age to be relegated to the rear in order to give way to young and more active men. As I have said, many corporations, including the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., the Edison Co., the American Tobacco Co., the American Sugar Refining Co., the International Harvester Co., the United States Steel Corporation, and many more companies of that size, have already met the situation, and they have established as part of their business an annuity of half salary to all of the employees in their different departments who have reached the age when they can no longer perform active duties. And the returns to the companies have been nothing short of marvelous. The return for new activity from the economical business standpoint is one that these corporations who have met the situation reply they could not do without.

I hope when this bill is reported by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads that the Members of this House will see to it that the Department of the Post Office can get that which they have asked for year in and year out, and that we will offer some protection to the old men in the service.

There are other sections of this bill, Mr. Chairman, which our committee has dealt with, and which perhaps have been advanced on the floor of this House. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] on Saturday last dealt with most of them. I have here statistics dealing with each and all of them and which I will not ask the House to listen to, but I will ask permission to put them in the RECORD later.

The question, Mr. Chairman, of compensatory time to the clerks in the post offices is another item. Congress a few years ago passed an act doing away with the Sunday work, but it has become necessary in the short time since it passed to open again that branch of the service for the benefit of those who, I believe, do not need it. I do not believe it was the intention of the Government when it passed this act that the employees of the post offices and the Post Office Department would be compelled to work on the days that are given to other people in other branches of the service and in other parts of the country to enjoy themselves and to rest. Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work, but the seventh day is the Sabbath, and thou shalt rest on the seventh day.

HOLIDAY OBSERVANCE IN THE POST OFFICE.

No thoughtful student of the economic trend in the development of our country for many years past, especially as this development affects the condition of labor, can fail to derive the greatest encouragement from such a review.

Wise legislation has brought some considerable measure of relief to the worker, and what has been done not alone blazes out the path we are treading but it also holds out a certain promise of an even brighter future. With all man's shortcomings the world is ever growing better. Where formerly men toiled from sun to sun now we are rapidly reaching the average eight-hour day. Children have been taken from the factory and sent to school. Our workshops are constructed with a more alert eye to comfort and sanitation. So, too, deeper concern is manifested by legislators for the protection of life and limb. The owners and operators of civil industries everywhere are displaying this same gratifying spirit. Instances abound where wages are voluntarily increased. Saturday half holidays are instituted for the benefit of the employees by an ever-growing movement of large institutions. Annual vacations are becoming an established industrial policy. Profit-sharing plans of endless variety are growing in popularity. Out-of-work and sick-benefit agreements, compensation for the wounded and diseased in labor's army, and pensions for the aged and superannuated worker in industry are now so universally being accepted as wise measures, based on sound business policy, as to excite little comment. Yet all this progress is part and parcel of a great and growing movement, having for its purpose a gradual lightening of the burdens of the average citizen in his struggle for existence.

No lover of his kind can fail to derive sincere satisfaction from this summary. Yet we must not forget, in passing, that this movement for the uplift of mankind in general is not alone indorsed by a generous sense of justice, but it is backed by every reason based upon sound public policy. If the Nation is to enjoy prosperity, such prosperity must find its origin in the prosperity of labor itself. In a land of superabundance, with a people whose hand and head can produce wealth in endless profusion, there should be no pause in this splendid forward movement to lightening the burden of the toilers of the land. Every year should record progress along these lines. Nor is there the slightest doubt but what this view is shared by the overwhelming majority of the people. This progressive policy, with which the very atmosphere seems to be surcharged, apparently has not reached the Post Office Department. On the contrary, actuated by some false idea of economy, all its efforts seem to be directed to lay greater burdens on the backs of its employees, shave to narrower proportions their already meager income, and little by little take from them every privilege that previous administrations have given them.

Instead of moving ahead, following the same path of progress that marks the trend of civil industry, most of the efforts of the Post Office Department seem to be spent in seeking out reactionary methods to rob the employees of rights and privileges they have long enjoyed. This, too, in the face of the fact that every Christmas, with its deluge of mail, is followed by a message of approbation to the employees from the Postmaster General for their unparalleled efficiency.

One after another, the department has through recommendation and regulation, sought to strike down or annul practically every concession granted these employees by Congress or public sentiment, until suspicion and apprehension of what the morrow may bring has taken the place of trust and confidence.

One of the most recent orders of this kind was issued by First Assistant Postmaster General Roper on November 20, 1915, directing that on all future holidays at least one full delivery of mail by city carriers should be made. Prior to the issuance of this order, postmasters in free-delivery offices found authority for holiday observance in section 284, Postal Laws and Regulations, which permitted them to be guided largely by the needs of the service in their community and local sentiment on the subject. If the desire of the public was for a general observance of the holiday in question, then the wishes of the people were followed, resulting in a highly prized day of rest being tendered the employees. The result was a happy arrangement all around. No complaints came from the people, no additional cost was imposed upon the service, and the employees turned to their work on the following day with refreshened enthusiam and energy. Nobody was hurt. Everybody was completely satisfied. If, on the contrary, public sentiment favored holiday service, then the wishes of the people were respected. That was all there was about it. In short, to the local postmaster, interpreting the wishes of the patrons of his office, was left the decision of the amount of holiday service that should be rendered by city carriers on holidays. No delivery on such days was made by rural carriers, due to existing regulations covering the same.

Without the shadow of an excuse, all this has been changed. The order of General Roper of November 20, 1915, leaves no option with anybody regarding the service to be rendered by the post office on holidays. Banks may close, factories may draw their fires, the farmer and mechanic and the business man may cease their pursuits for a day and devote the time to undisturbed recreation and relaxation, but the letter carrier must not halt for a moment. Following the orders from Washington, he must carry out all the mail that comes in, even though he may have to carry it all back again. Was the Post Office Department the intimate reflection of the people's mental attitude, as it ought to be, then its treatment of its workers would largely mirror and correspond with the activities and progress that is taking place in civil life.

When any concession can be tendered the workers of any industry, either public or private, that does not lower the efficiency of the service or add to its cost of maintenance, then he who in executive authority will not agree, aye, anxiously bestow such privilege, belongs to an age other than this.

I sincerely hope that Congress here and now will find a way to correct this injustice. If the people want to observe holidays, pray let us not stop them. We have few enough days for play as it is. If the banks, farms, and factories can stand still for a little while to permit their workers to spend the day in patriotic rejoicing, for instance, in heaven's name let the post office follow suit. No, more, let her be among the leaders. That is where she rightfully belongs. In justice to everybody concerned, the people and employees alike, let us wipe out such unnecessary and unjustifiable regulation. It smells of autocracy.

PROMOTION IN THE POSTAL SERVICE.

It is high time that Congress in legislating for the needs of the Postal Service should come to a full realization of the fact that they are providing ways and means for the maintenance and the management of a great business corporation. More than this, it is not alone a great business corporation, but in the number of its employees, in the multitude of its patrons, in the multiplicity of its business transactions, in the importance of its service to the social and business needs of the people, and in the diversity of its physical operations it stands without a peer to-day in the business activities of our country. It is not alone a great corporation; it is the greatest.

Naturally, then, there can be but one answer to the question as to how best care for this great business enterprise, and that answer is, to bring to its administration the most modern and approved methods of business and industrial management, tempered with such wise and generous provisions as move the people in caring for an industry owned by the people, run by the people, for the benefit of the people.

That Congress has either been indifferent, insensible, or negligent to the pressing necessity of adopting a policy for the administration of the Post Office Department, purely and impartially business in character, is so self-evident that no one familiar with postal affairs would have the temerity to challenge this statement. A policy peculiarly its own guides the affairs of the Post Office. Through a series of evolutionary changes its management has reached a point where nothing like it exists upon the face of the earth. It is neither business management nor political management. Its type is all its own.

This is true because, beginning with the day of private transportation of mail, followed by the Government taking over the postal business as a purely governmental function and making of it a governmental monopoly, down until the present hour, when it has grown to be a business of such astounding proportions, the Postal Service has undergone one change after another.

For a great number of years its management was purely political. Its officials and employees were appointed as a reward for political activity. So aggravated became the incompetency of service rendered and so unreliable became the service itself that in 1883, in response to an irresistible public sentiment, Congress enacted a civil-service law which covered under its provisions a few of the employees in the post office. So successful in operation has been the history of civil service in the Post Office Department that every President of the United States since the enactment of the first civil-service law, through Executive order, covered additional employees under the protection of the civil-service law in the Postal Service, until now practically all of the lower grades of employees have a tenure of office based upon merit instead of an appointment based upon political favor.

With the introduction of civil service in the Post Office, the service itself is continually growing in favor. It grew to be and is now the popular department of governmental work with the people. They are proud of it. Every movement to extend its functions, every addition to the character of the service rendered, every policy that had for its purpose the raising of the standard of its efficiency and usefulness, and all legislation calculated to more widely divorce from politics the business administration of the Post Office has met their unqualified and hearty approval.

Thus some progress has been made. Slow and difficult has it been at times, always confronted by the most intense opposition. Selfish interest, reactionary conservatism, political intrigue, all combined to prevent the Post Office from reaching its full capacity of usefulness as it naturally would, when placed under a wise and judicious business management. The hour has now struck, however, when the Post Office must be divorced absolutely from politics. The people will be played with no longer. The business has grown too big. Too important is its relationship to the people and too profound is the effect this great institution has in its diversified activities upon the life of the people and of our Republic to permit us longer to temporize with a condition that demands a cure.

Few of us appreciate just how large the Post Office has grown and how much it enters into the life of the people. To-day it has a quarter of million of employees. It renders the people all sorts of service. Rural routes reaching practically every farmer of the country. City Delivery Service in all the cities. Postal savings banks connected with the Post Office with millions on deposit. A registered system for transporting valuable consignments of mail matter. A money-order system, making a safe and easy conveyance of money possible. Parcel post, with its total of a billion packages transported last year as an amazing record to be studied with profit. Insured parcels where the sender in case of loss is indemnified. Collect-on-delivery parcel post, adding a money collection system to the service furnished by this department. Special-delivery letters, the next of kin to the telegraph. Guarding the mail against fraudulent use by dishonest patrons. Compiling a directory, and correcting it daily, of practically all the citizens in the United States. Doing a business, all told, which reaches a total of over $300,000,000 a year—this is the work of the Post Office Department. Does such a business admit of any other policy than the application of proper business methods for its safe administration?

How, then, is it managed? In so far as its employees are concerned, here is the policy that is followed: Demanding that none but the best shall be made eligible for employment in its service, it lays down rules of the most rigid character to which an applicant must qualify before becoming one of its employees. Take, for instance, the position of clerk and carrier in the various post offices—a vocation of which I am most familiar—the following are the rules laid down affecting their original admission as employees in the Postal Service: A physical test involving age, weight, and the present physical condition of the employee must first be passed. Assurance of a high moral character must also be offered. Then the applicant must undergo a severe civil-service examination and pass it at a high grade before admission to the service is made possible. Receiving appointment, it would appear that every opportunity would be afforded an employee of this character to advance in the service as rapidly as his qualifications would make it possible, but this is by no means the case.

An enforced period of substitution of varying lengths of time is the first natural order of employment. After three, four, or five years the substitute clerk or carrier secures his employment as a regular, entering at an entrance salary of $800 a year. If he maintains a meritorious record, he can be promoted every year until a maximum of $1,100 and $1,200 is reached; $1,100 for second-class post offices, $1,200 for first class. There he stops. Little or no opportunity is provided for him to advance beyond this position. No matter how he may apply himself to his duties, no matter how meritorious may have been the character of service he has rendered or his marked fitness to assume the responsibilities of a higher station, the present policy of administration of the Post Office Department practically prohibits any opportunity for advancement on the part of this man.

And how does it come that this is true? In my foregoing remarks I have tried to show how important and intricate is the work of the post office and what a high degree of technical knowledge of the business is necessary for its wise handling. Surely it would seem that in this great enterprise of the people the department would select the most trained men it could find to carry out the important and responsible work of the post office. As a matter of fact, it does nothing of the kind. Politics is the deciding factor in the selection of the postmaster and the general supervisory force that manages the post office, from the Postmaster General down. In fact, it is a matter of common knowledge that men who are utterly ignorant of any of the intricate details connected with this voluminous business are appointed to responsible positions for the purpose of directing its management. Would such a system be tolerated for an instant in private business? What would be the fate of any enterprise in civil life which instead of selecting skilled men to operate and manage the industry, choose men who are utterly ignorant of the business? That industry would fail. There is no question about it. Such a policy, however, would never be entertained for a moment by capable men having charge of private industry. Yet this is the very policy that to-day exists in the operation of the Post Office Department.

This, too, in spite of the fact that, if I judge public sentiment aright, the people are heartily sick of its continuance. The people are interested in good service, reasonable rates of postage, decent treatment of the employees by the Post Office Department, and the widest opportunity that is possible to permit deserving and capable employees to advance in their chosen profession as a reward for ability and merit. To bring about such a result an absolute divorce of politics in the postal business must be effected and all positions within the service should be open for employees within the service to aspire to as a reward for merit and ability.

This absence of any promotion in the service not only has an unfavorable effect on the character of service rendered itself, but it also operates to the injury of the employee in divers ways. Recruiting from the people at large, by the exacting system that I have heretofore mentioned, a class of employees of unusual efficiency and ability, the Post Office Department takes them into its employment and inexorably follows a policy that can not help but chill the enthusiasm and energy of the most wideawake and ambitious man. Perceiving that from time to time postmasters and supervisory officers are selected to direct and discipline them—which, in effect, means that men long in the service and intimately acquainted with its everyday detail must be directed by officials who know little or nothing about the business—causes them to lose the keen and active interest in their own employment which they otherwise would have. The result is unfortunate all around. Even the postmaster who for a brief period of time is taken away from his regular employment to officiate in charge of a business with which he is unfamiliar and who later must give way to some other appointee selected for purely political reasons, finds at the close of his term that he has not been benefited either financially or otherwise by this policy. To the employee himself the policy has not a single redeeming feature. Likewise the service reflects the same injurious result of this policy.

No more ingenuous system could be devised than the present plan of preventing any promotion in the service for the employee. He realizes that meritorious work will not bring promotion and that promotion, if it comes at all, must come through political activity. Should the employee, however, attempt at all to win prominence in politics, he would be removed from the service at once on this very charge. Thus an employee can not be promoted in the service unless he is politically active, according to our present political custom, and if he is politically active he is discharged. Were this situation not so serious it would be indeed amusing. This is a part of the American system of government as applied to the largest business corporation within its confines. Common sense rebels at the thought of its indefinite continuance. More fitted for a plot in comic opera is it than as a basic principle for the management of the affairs of the great Post Office Department.

Without doubt, however, this absurd policy is doomed. Already there is some evidence of a rift in the clouds. The present administration has appointed four or five employees to the position of postmaster. In every such instance these appointments met with the undivided approval of the people. In one instance, Mr. William E. Kelly, a letter carrier in Brooklyn and head of the Letter Carriers' Association, was made postmaster of Brooklyn by President Wilson. One year and a half following this appointment he was selected as a candidate for county clerk of Kings County, N. Y., and in his election he overcame a majority held by his opponent of more than 62,000. Thus it can be seen with what high favor such appointments are received by the public.

I most seriously and impressibly desire to call the attention of this body to the danger that attends a continuation and a maintenance of this policy of which I am speaking and which prevents any reasonable opportunity for promotion in the service of the Government. It is un-American. It is not in keeping with the thought of the time. It is not calculated to do aught but harm. It has a most depressing effect upon the employee himself. It bodes ill for the future of our country. It was Herbert Spencer who said, in laying down a fundamental basis for his philosophy on economics:

> That no state of society or no form of government can long persist that fails to penalize indolence or reward merit.

At its best let us not forget that Government employment offers little to the active young man in the way of a career. The Post Office Department devises a plan which insures it the services of a picked set of men. In return it offers them little either in the way of remuneration or reward. It holds them to a task important in character. Should they leave the service, no other market exists wherein they can sell the technical knowledge of the Postal Service that they have gained by years of careful application to duty. No prospect of promotion is held out to spur the employee on to renewed effort, to keep alive in his breast the spark of ambition or to awaken in him the anxious and earnest desire to master and comprehend in its fullest the details of the business to which he has given his life. It is unthinkable that this must continue. Without doubt the hour has struck wherein this whole system must be changed, and the Post Office Department, through this Congress, proclaim to the people that hereafter and henceforth its operation will be conducted along the lines of such sound business principles as will be most conducive to good service, wise administration of postal affairs, and the widest opportunity for promotion in the service. May the day come when the youth of America may be inspired by having held out to them as an example of what application, energy, and ability can do, of a Postmaster General who began his postal career at the lowest rung in the ladder of the service and through devotion to duty rose to the highest place within its gift.

THE 150-DAY LEAVE-OF-ABSENCE REGULATION.

The following regulation laid down by the Post Office Department establishing an arbitrary time limit setting the hour when letter carriers employed in the City Delivery Service, who through misfortune, illness, or accident are forced to absent themselves from duty for an extended period, must therefore relinquish their positions, has been the source of the most bitter complaint and protest on the part of these employees. Nor are these objections offered without good and sufficient reason. This rule is a rigid and unnecessary regulation. It reads as follows:

> Postmasters may, in addition to the leave of absence with pay provided by law, grant leave of absence without pay to carriers, such leave not to exceed 30 days in any one calendar year. Applications for leave of absence to cover a longer period in cases of illness or disability received in the service must be submitted by the postmaster to the First Assistant Postmaster General with a full statement of the facts, but leave of absence for more than 150 days in one calender year will not be granted in any such case. Carriers who desire to be absent for longer periods will be dropped from the rolls without prejudice.

It will be noted that this regulation, in effect, means just what it says, which is that no matter what the circumstances in the case are, or notwithstanding how meritorious and convincing may be the plea offered by the carrier who seeks the extended leave of absence from duty, for any cause, this leave "will not be granted."

In the actual application of this regulation it works untold hardships and trials on these deserving men, and many are the instances in which postal employees have been compelled to resign from the service through the operation of this law.

In other cases employees have suffered lasting injuries, upon their application for leave of absence being denied, by being held to their tasks through fear of dismissal. Common sense on the part of the post-office officials, or any sane regulation permitting of reasonable discretion in granting leave of absence, would have been a blessing to many an employee relieved from a trying mental strain without any consequent loss to the service.

Instances exist in which employees have sought extended leave to recover their health, and invariably have had such applications denied. Other cases arise where employees, hoping to save the life of some stricken member of their family through change of climate, apply for extended leave to accompany their loved ones, but without success.

Absence from duty due to illness or accident for a period in excess of 30 days, or even 150 days, is of common occurrence among the employees. Generally, such disability is due to diseases or accident contracted in the service resulting from the exposed and severe character of letter carriers' work. Employees compelled to suffer under such trying circumstances, unable to perform their usual labors, noting with a troubled mind the approach of the day and hour when they automatically must sever their connection with the service through the operation of this oppressive rule, too often the worry and apprehension they experience provides the worst possible bar to their early recovery. Again this rule is made an instrument by the department to quietly and without fuss or feathers rid the service of the old carrier who can no longer keep up with the rapid pace laid down for the younger employees.

The history of this department-made rule is an unbroken record of blind enforcements of its provisions, indifferent alike to any argument that appealed to either the heart or head.

Again quoting this regulation, your attention is directed to its closing sentence, which says "carriers denied leave will be dropped from the rolls without prejudice." Without prejudice means little or nothing. The facts in the matter are that when an employee is out of the service, he is out of it, and the chances that he will be permitted to return to his position again are remote indeed.

Discipline, even strict discipline, is imperative to the capable administration of any business institution. Rules are needed for the guidance of men, and these rules once laid down must be observed in the spirit that is intended. No sensible man thinks otherwise. Discipline, however, does not mean oppression. It does not mean that hard and fast laws, designed to fit every case, should be attempted. Such a policy invariably spells failure, leaving nothing for the judgment of the local postmasters; allowing nothing for the opinion of supervisory officials; taking no account whatsoever of any meritorious cases that must arise; making no allowance for a carrier's years of service, his record, or his loyal devotion to duty, this 150-day leave of absence rule is worse than tyrannical, it is absurd. It should be repealed without hesitation, or so modified as to come within the realm of common sense. Failing to do this, it will always be an endless source of trouble. It will keep discontent awake among the workers; it will prejudice many a deserving employee's position—the one thing of chief importance to every man. It will work injury in a governmental department, where open-handed justice should be the rule, and instead of promoting discipline in the service it will foster confusion.

Wherever men are employed it is rare, indeed, that a capable executive officer, having the natural friendly interest in those under his supervision that he ought to have, will give sweeping and wholesale refusal to every application for leave of absence. On the contrary, acquiescence in appeals for leave in meritorious cases is the rule rather than the exception.

I note in the Washington Times of January 26 where leave of absence of a year's duration was tendered a prominent and gifted teacher in the District schools, daughter of a Member of this body, for the purpose of broader study. For the same reason the Bell Telephone Co., the large railroad corporations, and a number of other institutions make similar provisions for the employees' welfare. In fact, many sympathetic employers of labor leave a departing employee's position open for his return, contingent upon his satisfaction with his new field of endeavor. Even in the administration of the Post Office Department during the Spanish-American War, by order of the Postmaster General, employees were advised that they could enlist in the Army of the Republic, remaining so engaged until the close of the war, and then return with an assurance that their old places would be restored to them. If such leaves can be tendered, surely the stricken or afflicted employee unable to care for himself should have a like privilege or courtesy extended him in the hour of his misfortune.

Time after time, through their associations, the postal employees of the country have most respectfully petitioned for the modification or abrogation of this regulation, but their petition has fallen upon deaf ears. It should be the duty of Congress to see that this intolerable regulation be consigned to the same scrap heap with other barbarous customs of the past.

THE COMPENSATION LAW FOR POSTAL EMPLOYEES AND THE CONSTRUCTION AT PRESENT PLACED UPON IT BY THE POST OFFICE OFFICIALS.

On March 9, 1914, an act was approved providing that "postal employees injured in the performance of their duty should be compensated by the Government for injuries received under such circumstances." The provisions of this act gave leave of absence with full pay to injured employees during the period of disability not exceeding 1 year, and where period of disability continued in excess of 1 year half pay was allowed for not exceeding 12 months additional. The law further provides that the sum of $2,000 shall be paid to the beneficiaries of employees killed in the performance of duty, or where death of employee occurred as result of such injuries within one year thereafter. The passage of this law by the American Congress was due to a gradual but marked change of thought covering the long period of years in the minds of the American people regarding the whole question of compensation for injuries received by employees, where such injuries found origin in the act of producing wealth for the needs of society.

For many years past, when such cases in civil life were the subject of litigation, if it could be shown by the employer that the employee was partly responsible for his injuries through contributory negligence, proof of this fact militated heavily against the employee in his claim for damages or compensation. But an entire change of thought on the whole subject has taken place in the minds of the people and legislators, and has grown to be a general and settled conviction in public thought that to leave the maimed or injured employee to shift for himself would be, in the first place, to the highest degree unjust to the employee in question, and, again, that society would eventually have to bear the burden of caring for such employee, either directly or indirectly, no matter what law existed which had a bearing upon the question. And, further, there came a fixed idea that compensation for injuries received in production should be a fixed charge placed upon the product, and rates and prices should be made accordingly instead of leaving the injured and unfortunate employee to be tossed about by the caprice of chance or to face the prospects of expensive litigation. In short, with the passage of the first compensation act a decided step forward was determined upon, and it was taken, until now the whole philosophy of employers' liability, at present so simple that any layman can grasp it, rests upon this foundation: An employee injured or killed in the act of producing for society, it becomes society's duty to care for him until he is able to produce again, or in case of death to make reasonable provisions for the care of those left dependent upon him for support were he alive. This is the answer of the entire problem. It is a newly acknowledged obligation of society and it offers one of the most encouraging signs of the times. This principle takes no note of contributory negligence or of the fellow-servant idea, and it casts out of its calculations as being unworthy of any weight whatsoever the assumption that an employee may deliberately maim himself so as to secure compensation later on. It simply holds the thought that one of the army of industry is wounded in action and therefore justifiably entitled to assistance. The purpose of the law is to provide how and in what manner this assistance shall be tendered. Legislation embracing this idea affecting employees in civil life has been adopted by the majority of States in the Union, and, in response to the sentiment of the people on the subject, the Democratic Party, in its last national convention, inserted in its declaration of principles the following pledge:

> We favor the extension to all classes of civil-service employees of the benefits of the provision of the employers' liability act.

As a further proof, if further proof were needed, of the universal acceptance of the new idea of obligation as revealed in the employers' liability law and similar measures of the times, attention is directed to the vote on the Reilly compensation law, of which I am now speaking. When it was before the House at its last session for consideration it passed on a roll call by the remarkable vote of 323 ayes to 17 nays. There can be no doubt of the temper of the people or of this body upon the general subject of compensation for injured Government employees. Heretofore the Government could not be held liable for such injuries as the employees suffered, but Congress, anxious to put the Government employees on the same plane as employees in civil life, adopted the generous and specific provisions for their compensation as embraced in the Reilly compensation act, with no thought but what these provisions enacted into law would be administered in the spirit that it was intended they should be.

This has not been done. The spirit and purpose that animated the Congress in passing this law seems to be in no way understood by the postal officials whose duty it is to administer and carry out its provisions. Instead, many incidents arise indicating that the reception this law received in administrative circles of the Post Office Department was anything but friendly. While the act providing for compensation for injured Government employees was approved March 9, 1914, effective on same date, it was not until October 13, 1914, that a set of rules and regulations providing for the operation of this law were promulgated. Furthermore, many claims arising under this law were not paid till more than a year had elapsed from the date of its passage. This delay seems inexplicable, and it requires no flight of the imagination to appreciate the inconvenience, if not actual suffering, that such a delay worked upon such claimants as were in no position to withstand such a long period of waiting.

Moreover, in surrounding this law with all sorts of legal technicalities, undreamed of by the framers, reviving the section of contributory negligence, and placing the burden of proof upon the injured employees, has resulted in many meritorious claims being rejected.

Under the old conception of employers' liability it was admissible for an employer to attempt to prove that an employee was guilty of contributory negligence. The post-office officials have swung back much further than this by taking an entirely new tack. Instead of proving contributory negligence on the part of the employee in exception to his claim, they compel the employee to prove that he has not himself been negligent, and inability to furnish such proof operates heavily against payment of claim. Many cases arise showing how every possible technicality is invoked to avoid settlement of claims under this law and how unjustifiably rigid and strict is the construction placed upon its interpretation, which, in effect, defeats the very aim and purpose of the measure.

I have had a case brought to my attention of an employee in the Buffalo post office, which, to my mind, is an aggravated case. A letter carrier returning from his district walked into the post office through the regular entrance and, after depositing mail matter on a table designated for receiving it, he started through the regular passageway to ring the time clock, and in doing so his foot caught in a noose made by tie cords of a number of canvas sacks that were thrown in the passageway and he was thrown heavily to the floor and received injuries that laid him up for a period of nearly two months. This case was submitted to the department with a statement of the facts, and the postmaster was notified that "from the evidence submitted and the fact that it was customary to have bags in this position, it is not clear that the carrier was not negligent," and he was denied compensation.

I will cite a case of a letter carrier named Coles A. Davis, attached to the Brooklyn post office, who died of injuries received by him as the result of a collision between a truck and a trolley car. In this case it appears that the carrier was on a "swing" from 5.45 to 6.45 p. m., during which time he would get his supper, but his schedule required that he proceed on his next trip starting from a letter box near his home at 6.45 p. m. He had with him at the time of the accident his letter carrier's bag and the key for opening letter boxes, and was authorized to use the street car to proceed to his home on his own time, so far as his schedule was concerned, thus saving to the department the time required to reach the starting point of his next trip. He was in full uniform and subject to all the rules and regulations of the Post Office Department, with the exception of being paid for the time he consumed on this "swing." From the evidence submitted it was found that the carrier was not guilty of any actual negligence whatever, but in order to deprive his wife and children of compensation the officials ruled that he was not actually on duty at the time of the injury, within the meaning of the provisions of the compensation law, and the application was denied.

I cite another case for the information of the committee: A letter carrier employed in the Cincinnati post office and employed in the collection of mail was driving his horse and rig from the barn to the postal station on the morning of January 5, 1915. It was a stormy morning and the streets were very slippery, and, in compliance with the warning of a trolley car, he turned out of the tracks to let the car pass by, but not before the car struck his wagon and threw him out, and he suffered from injuries and shock which laid him up for a considerable period of time, and he was denied compensation on the technical ruling that he was not on duty, as he had not actually reported at the postal station before the accident occurred.

As I said before, Mr. Chairman, in the last analysis society must bear the burden of its maimed and injured workers, no matter by whatsoever means we attempt to shift the burden. We can recognize this obligation by placing their maintenance on neighbors, relatives, or friends, or we can compel them to fasten a millstone about their necks, by mortgaging their future to meet the unfortunate emergency not of their own making. Neither of these alternatives are acceptable. They have been rejected by the sound common sense of the American people, as not being either expedient or just and to the extent that the employers' liability law has been applied to the protection of labor in American industry it has been the solace and refuge to both employer and employee alike. It is the law of unmixed good. No reason whatsoever of any value can be advanced why this law, as it affects Government employees, should not be interpreted in a broad spirit of kindness and generosity. This Government, which insists upon justice being done to employees in civil life, should be on the alert to point the way by the manner and method in which it deals with its own workers. If postal officials fail to comprehend the spirit and purpose of this law by administering it as it was intended it should be administered, then this Congress should find a way in which to compel them to do simple justice to employees placed under their supervision, instead of leaving these same employees to the tender mercies of an unfriendly court, who insists upon placing on this law whatsoever construction that pleases them most, and who seem to be moved by a purpose which, to say the least, conveys the impression of a mistaken idea of duty.

PROPER SANITATION OF POST OFFICES.

The primary object of all legislation is not alone to provide for the needs of the people in their diversified activities, but it also should deeply concern itself with the effect of such legislation upon the well-being of individual citizens. As the morals, the efficiency, in fact, the general usefulness of the people, must, first of all, largely find its origin in their average health, no subject should awaken deeper or more sustained interest on the part of Congress than all questions pertaining to the conservation of health. Not alone should Congress be deeply alive to every issue involving the health of its citizens, but it should also, in legislating for its own employees, make such provisions against illness, due to unsanitary surroundings, as the people and most modern thought on the subject indorse. In fact, in this respect, Government buildings and all places where governmental work is performed should, by the completeness of their sanitary equipment, offer an example to all other industry, showing the most efficient method to conserve life and prevent illness or occupational diseases on the part of the employees from germ-laden surroundings. There is no division of opinion on this question; good health is synonymous with efficiency and economy. Few there are who now fail to realize this truth. We are also beginning to learn that society must in the end bear the burden, either directly or indirectly, of its diseased stricken units, and no public policy is more short-sighted than one which fails to take every precaution to insure the virility based on good health, which is the rightful heritage of every citizen.

That we have been almost criminally negligent in this respect, your attention is directed, as proof of this contention, to buildings used for post-office purposes throughout the Nation which house the vast army of postal employees. Built at a great expenditure of public money, these structures reveal conclusively that little, if any, consideration is given to health, comfort, or well-being of the employees in their designing. In referring to just such a state of affairs in the Chicago post-office building, Congressman SABATH, in a public address, said:

> In all this talk about the future greatness and glory of Chicago and the prospective size of her future postal business we are overlooking the most important thing of all, and that is the convenience and working conditions of the employees who must work in this building.

A like indictment would fit practically all post-office buildings. Dark, dingy, and poorly lighted, with the most inadequate provisions for the admission of sunlight, a factor which is now recognized as the most effective preventive against all diseases, beginning with tuberculosis on down the list, these buildings are a sorry example of inefficient construction. Poorly ventilated and often as uncertainly heated, the office furniture is usually so placed against windows as to exclude even as much light and air as would otherwise enter. Exposed toilets are the rule, shocking in their immodesty, and in the same room will be generally found the water supply of the office used for drinking purposes. Adjacent is the quarters generally assigned the employees to eat their lunch. Bubbling fountains are rare. Hundreds of mail sacks, never cleaned or disinfected, are shaken out daily, contaminating the air with fine particles of dust pregnant with germs of every kind. Often the employees are unnecessarily crowded together at their work. Provisions for individual towels, soap, or other agents to secure cleanliness are neglected.

Rules to make certain the proper sanitation of such buildings are seldom given a thought, and even the sweeping and dusting of workrooms is most often and without good reason performed at a time when the employees are busily engaged in their duties. It is no surprise that, under such circumstances, hundreds of postal employees trace some serious malady to these same insanitary working conditions, for which no valid excuse can be assigned why they now or in the future should exist. Furthermore, a glance in any post-office workroom will reveal an alarming number of young men wearing glasses, resulting from eyestrain contracted in their dingy quarters. Such is a hurried review of some of the insanitary conditions that obtain in post offices throughout the country where 200,000 of our useful citizens are serving as employees of the Government. On no ground whatsoever can such conditions be defended. They should be corrected without delay. They are of unmixed evil in a day when one of the chief motives that actuate every builder of an industrial workshop throughout the land is the adoption of such devices and plans as will most insure the safety and health of the employees. Our Government in the administration of the post office has grown careless and thoughtless upon this subject to a degree altogether without justification. It demands correction.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 14, 1916.

Mr. PETER F. TAGUE.
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In behalf of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks, I desire to thank you for the assistance you rendered as a member of the House Post Office and Post Roads Committee in having incorporated into the postal appropriation bill a number of remedial legislative features of great value to the postal workers.

You and your colleagues are to be commended for the consideration given the employees' interests in making up the bill, and I trust that the House will accept the committee's recommendations and thereby make possible the eventual enactment of these worthy features.

EXTENSION OF COMPENSATION ACT.

The committee has amplified the compensation for injury act to make it applicable to all classified civil-service employees in the Postal Service. This is timely and most desirable, assuring, as it does, relief in case of injuries or death to many employees or their dependents who are now excluded from the benefit of the compensation act.

INCREASE IN LABORERS' PAY.

The abolishment of the $720 wage scale for laborers in favor of an $840 scale is to be commended. In view of the nature of the work performed by these laborers, an arduous, responsible work, requiring physical and mental fitness, this wage increase of $10 monthly is conceded to be rightfully bestowed.

PRINTERS' WAGE INCREASE.

The bill also carries some wage increases for the printers employed in the post offices, bringing the compensation of these men nearer that paid in private employment for the same character of work.

REBATE FOR HOLIDAY SERVICE.

I am aware of the keen personal interest you took in securing the legislation contained in the bill to rebate holiday service to clerks and carriers by granting them compensatory time off upon one of the following 30 days. At present many employees in the service, particularly mail distributors and letter carriers, are deprived of holidays because of the nature of their work. This legislation brings a measure of relief to these men by granting them compensatory time for service rendered on holidays. It is fair, just, and equitable. The liberal 30-day limitation will inflict no administrative hardship or difficulties upon the department.

SPECIAL CLERKS.

The creation of a distinct "special clerk" grade at $1,300 and at $1,400 is one of the most important sections in the bill for post-office clerks at the first-class offices. It will make possible promotions to a particularly deserving class of employees, the skilled, experienced, trained clerk, whose work is so necessary to service efficiency.

For the most part I think the men who will benefit by this designation of "special clerk" and the resultant wage increase are the distributors, the expert workers who must master intricate distribution schemes upon their own time, studying at home after or before office hours. The bulk of the mail distribution is done at night, but Congress has never recognized the admitted hardships of this work by granting a wage or a time differential to the men performing it. In my judgment, all work performed between the hours of 6 p. m. and 6 a. m. should be computed on the basis of 45 minutes to the hour, thus giving a time differential of 15 minutes to the night workers, the distributors, who must of necessity study at home in order to maintain their proficiency in office work. Until the night workers are granted this proposed time differential they at least should have the preference in the promotions to the "special clerk" grades at $1,300 and $1,400, providing, of course, their seniority standing and their efficiency records entitle them to eligibility.

THE DEMOTED COLLECTORS.

Because of the pathetic features attending the demotion of many efficient collectors in the City Delivery Service from $1,200 to $1,100 and $1,000 a year ago, the determination of the committee to restore these workers to their rightful salary grades and to prevent a recurrence of the tragedy has created a profound impression in the service. The view of the employees has been that the department misinterpreted the classification law in establishing a $1,000 grade for collectors. If such a salary distinction could be made for collectors, many other distinctions, such as stamp clerk, registry clerk, money-order clerk, and a hundred other designations, could be made, each one graded in salary to suit the whim of the official making the distinction. In ordering the restoration of the demoted collectors the committee has in effect interpreted the classification law of 1907 to prevent an administrative official in future from reducing efficient workers by creating salary distinctions not contemplated by Congress.

Last February, when the department first started to demote the collectors, President Gompers, of the American Federation of Labor, Representative BUCHANAN of Illinois, and I had a conference with Postmaster Genearl Burleson, during which this matter was discussed. At the suggestion of the Postmaster General a statement of facts was submitted to him. I am inclosing a copy of this statement for your careful perusal.

"FEBRUARY 23, 1915.

"HON. A. S. BURLESON,
"Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

"SIR: At the conference you accorded the undersigned on February 18 it was agreed that we submit a statement of facts concerning the reduction of salaries of letter carriers and post-office clerks throughout the country by the department.

"The facts are: In the operation of the recently inaugurated economy policy the salary grades of the clerks and the carriers in various cities are being reclassified in accordance with their working assignments and in disregard of length of service or efficiency, both of which elements enter into the classification law enacted by Congress to govern the promotion of postal employees, resulting in wage reductions of $100 or $200 annually to many faithful workers.

"The situation in the Chicago office will best illustrate a condition that is causing widespread apprehension and suffering among the men in the service. They feel and express that feeling, where and when they safely may—that a great injustice is being done them.

"In Chicago 350 letter carriers who are assigned to the collection service of the post office have been notified that hereafter $1,000 per annum will be the maximum salary paid for this character of work. Heretofore these men have been receiving $1,100 or $1,200 yearly. They were given the alternative of accepting a wage reduction of $100 or $200 yearly or to be transferred into the delivery service. A number of clerks whose duties were considered less arduous than others were also notified that a reduction of salary would be effective at once. No charges of inefficiency were brought against these men—they were hapless victims of the arbitrary, rigid line of demarkation the department is making not between the efficient and the inefficient but between men of equal worth who happen to be assigned to different tasks, between which the classification law makes no distinction.

"That the department can reduce the salary of an employee who falls below the standard of efficiency or for purposes of discipline there can be no doubt; but we deny the department's right to establish unauthorized titles or wage distinctions not contemplated by Congress nor authorized by law, and thereby reducing automatically the salaries of employees by arbitrary assignment and without regard for seniority or proved efficiency—the only two elements recognized by the classification law.

"The appropriation by Congress for the Postal Service from which the salaries of these men who have suffered reductions are being paid makes no mention of the titles 'collectors' or 'distributors.' Congress provided $44,470,000 for the payment of clerks and various designated supervisory employees; and 'for pay of letter carriers at offices already established, including substitutes for letter carriers absent without pay, and for the promotion of 75 per cent of the letter carriers in first-class post offices from the fifth to the sixth grade and for the promotion of 75 per cent of the letter carriers in second-class offices from the fourth to the fifth grade, city delivery service, $37,700,000.'

"The present classification law, enacted by Congress in 1907, and subsequently amended, which governs the promotions of clerks and carriers, provides in substance as follows: That clerks and carriers shall be classified in five grades; that appointments shall be made to lowest grade—$800 per annum—and that promotions (based on efficiency) shall be made successively yearly to the fifth grade—$1,100—in first-class offices. Promotions from $1,100 to $1,200 are dependent upon the action of Congress each year.

"It is significant to note that Congress, by voting year after year to promote 75 per cent of the clerks and carriers in first-class offices from the $1,100 to the $1,200 grade, repeatedly reiterated its belief that a $1,200 yearly salary is the fixed standard for all efficient clerks and carriers.

"Inasmuch as all promotions in the service are dependent upon the employee reaching the standard of efficiency set by the department, it follows that every letter carrier and clerk receiving $1,200 must necessairily have earned it by faithful, competent service. He can not be reduced in rank and compensation unless charges in writing are preferred against him. The provisions of the act of Congress, August 24, 1912, demonstrates this fact.

"No written charges have been preferred against the Chicago letter carriers avering that they are inefficient. No such charges could be substantiated. These men are still performing exactly the same character of service as last year, when their great efforts to aid the Post Office Department in earning a $3,600,000 surplus received your hearty commendation.

"With inadequate equipment they are daily collecting mail and delivering parcel post; they are charged with the added responsibility of collecting money on c. o. d. parcels; they are abroad in the crowded streets of a great city contending against weather and traffic difficulties; they must adhere, without the deviation of a minute, to a schedule which admits of no delay without disarranging all the closely correlated functions of the mail service. The work and the responsibility of collectors precludes, as you know, the thought that these positions are sinecures. Upon its proper performance depends the prompt dispatch and subsequent delivery of all mail.

"These collectors, it is true, are for the most part men of somewhat advanced years, but yet of ripe experience. They are ideally fitted for the work, performing the duties probably better than young and restive men could. The alternative of accepting a wage reduction or accepting a transfer into the delivery service—to again take up the work from which most of them graduated years before—has been given them. But with this alternative is coupled the unkind suggestion, the veiled threat, that a failure as a delivery carrier might result in permanent separation from the service for inefficiency. Under this coercion many collectors have signed letters accepting a $200 reduction in their salaries, thus relieving the department of the necessity of filing charges of inefficiency. For fear of losing all they have, they have, under duress, accepted a wage reduction of 9 or of 16 per cent.

"If the delivery of letters or the distribution of letters requires a higher order of intelligence than mail collecting or routine clerical work, it would seem the part of wisdom to pay the man doing this higher class of work an increased wage rather than drag the men not assigned to these tasks down to a lower scale of pay. We believe this is in accord with your ideas that the workers, both in and out of the Postal Service, are rightfully entitled to every opportunity to maintain a decent standard of living conditions. A reduced wage scale for a portion of the postal workers affects adversely the whole service. It lowers the standard, must impair the efficiency, and renders more difficult your task of economically administering the postal affairs of the Nation. No amount of driving, speeding up, or rigorous supervision, expensive in itself, can exact the amount of work from a $1,000 collector that a better-paid man will render ably, willingly, freely, loyally.

"We realize the department is confronted with the necessity of curtailing expenditures, owing to the falling off in postal revenues. If this curtailment must take the form of salary reductions, and if the department to effect economies can establish arbitrarily wage distinctions not authorized by Congress, we respectfully suggest a new classification for postmasters in first-class offices where the salaries range from $3,000 to $8,000 annually. These men are political appointees and, unlike the clerks and carriers whose salaries are being reduced, they have not for the most part rendered any conspicuous service in the past years toward aiding you in placing the department upon its present high plane of efficiency. This thought is suggested because of your expressed unwillingness 'to inflict undue and unnecessary hardships upon the workingmen in the ranks,' and because of your expressed opinion before the Senate Post Roads Committee that 'if 75 per cent of the postmasters were to die to-night, and I failed to appoint their successors, it would impair the efficiency of the Postal Service but very little.' If the law governing the wages of the employees can be even temporarily disregarded to effect economies, it would appear that a similar course taken with the postmasters' salaries would produce better results and be in closer accord with your ideas.

"Aside from the injury inflicted upon worthy employees by these wage reductions, and aside from the deleterious effect upon the efficiency of the service, there is another reason why the Postal Service should refrain from curtailing the wages or hours of its force. The country is facing a serious unemployment problem. Members of the President's Cabinet and leaders in the Democratic Party have advised employers not to aggravate this deplorable condition by laying off men from work. Employers are told that the depression is psychological; it will soon be over and the country once more riding on the high wave of prosperity. Yet we find the largest governmental institution, the Postal Service, which has rightly been called the barometer of business, retrenching at the expense of its hardest worked, poorest paid employees. This is wrong from a moral, humanitarian, and even from a business standpoint.

"When so many employers are cooperating with labor to obviate as much as possible a reduction in their force and to refrain from enforcing reductions in wages, there does not seem to us a justification for a Federal governmental department pursuing a diametrically opposite course as has been attempted in the Postal Service.

"At no time in the history of the oldest employee in the Postal Service have the lines been drawn more tightly. Carriers are overburdened with weighty parcels, clerks under the two-division plan are compelled to study twice as much at home in learning distribution schemes. From the lowest substitute to the highest supervisor there is little, if any, slack.

"Here in the city of Washington last week high-salaried inspectors and expert economists stood behind the sorely tried carriers with watch in hand timing their movement, following them out on their routes to detect any evidence of a let up in the speed the department insists must be shown. This is not an isolated case. It has been done and is being done in practically every large office in the land. This attempt of the department to drive men beyond the limit of their endurance and deprive thereby other men from an opportunity of securing work, is not likely to aid in the restoration of prosperous business conditions; neither will it make for a qualified, loyal, capable corps of postal workers.

"We feel that this statement of facts is sufficient to warrant the righting of the wrongs inflicted upon the efficient men in the ranks of the postal employees, and we, therefore, respectfully urge that the same may receive your early and favorable consideration and action."

SUPERANNUATION.

While the postal appropriation bill carries no legislation to take care of the superannuated employees, which is to be regretted, I know of your deep interest in this problem and I want to call your attention to the urgency of the need of congressional action to alleviate the situation confronting the aged postal workers.

The bill you have sponsored—to retire postal employees who have been in the service for 25 years or more or who have reached the age of 65 years, at their request, on an annuity of one-half of their salary—is a worthy measure and would certainly correct the distressful condition now existing.

As you are aware there are two schools of thought in the civil service upon this question of retirement; one favoring a contributory plan, the other a straight retirement plan. Upon this point, however, there is no division; we all agree that the men now superannuated should be taken care of at once without contributions on their part. Your measure would permit this to be done. It will relieve the service of the superannuated men and thus relieve the administrative officials of the stern necessity of further demotions and dismissals.

The department officials declare they must demote and dismiss those employees whose efficiency falls below the standard required. No exception can lawfully be made, it is said, in favor of the men who have given their all to the service. They must prepare for the headman's ax. There is no hope for the men who have grown old, the sturdy youths of 25 and 30 years ago who entered the service in the full bloom of a virile young manhood, who have since that time given their brain, brawn, and substance, given everything that men in their position of life have to give—their labor—toward the upbuilding and the perfection of this service. Inexorable Time, and he spares none of us, has palsied their hands, dimmed their eyesight, and slackened their pace, and they are now to be shunted upon the scrapheap, unwept, unhonored, and unsung—the hapless victims of an overzealous administration and an apathetic legislative body.

These aged postal workers are not asking for charity. They have contributed much to the country's welfare, although not in a spectacular manner that wins medals of honor from Congress. But it is these men, 35,000 post-office clerks, 32,000 city letter carriers, 22,000 railway mail clerks, 40,000 rural carriers, working day and night in the endless task of keeping the Nation's mail service performing its multifarious functions, who have made our Postal Service so nearly mechanically perfect that it operates with almost infallible accuracy. And the reward of those who have grown old and are growing old at an alarming rate is a dishonorable discharge. Congress alone has the power to give them a reward more in keeping with the service they have rendered the Government and society.

The salaries paid to postal employees do not permit of an adequate saving for old age; their work unfits them for occupation elsewhere; and, having given the productive years of their life to the Postal Service, they must tenaciously hang on until their grip is loosened by the administrative ax or the angel of death. Every four years or so a new set of officials enter at the top of the Postal Service. To them the old men are incumbrances; they interfere with economical administration; and hence the danger of decapitation is ever present and will always be imminent for the old men of the service until Congress adopts one of the many plans of retirement offered. Dismissing them from the service is at the best an evasion. They must be taken care of somehow. The claim of the superannuated is recognized by society in the form of State, municipal, fraternal, and private institutions to care for the aged. These worn postal workers must be taken care of in some manner, either directly or indirectly. To dismiss them is inhumane; to retain them is unsatisfactory from an administrative viewpoint. It would be an eventual economy to provide for their retirement on service annuities.

I am inclosing herewith an article from the November issue of the Union Postal Clerk, which tells of the case of John Perry, for 50 years a clerk in the San Francisco post office. This instance is but typical of many throughout the country:

"JOHN PERRY, OF SAN FRANCISCO, 50 YEARS IN SERVICE.

"When John W. Perry, registry clerk in the San Francisco post office, placed his time card back in the rack on the evening of October 16, it marked the close of a half century of continuous service in the post office and the probable ending of John Perry's actual connection with the service. Mr Perry has taken an extended leave of absence, awaiting in eager expectation some action on retirement legislation by the forthcoming Congress. He has no desire to attempt to continue longer in active service.

"When young John Perry entered the San Francisco post office on October 16, 1865, there were but 16 other employees, including the postmaster and his assistant. All the work of the office was performed in one room. There was no train connection with the East; mail was received three times a month by steamer. If the steamer arrived at night, young Perry and the other clerks were summoned from bed by messenger and were required to work until the distribution was completed. This necessitated working 20 hours continuously on some occasions.

"'But the old days, taken as a whole, were not so strenuous as at present,' recounts Mr. Perry. 'For the first month's work in the Postal Service, as a general-delivery clerk, I received $135, the highest pay I have ever received in my 50 years of service. There was a different atmosphere in the office then. Regulations were few; the surveillance was not strict. We were placed upon our honor, and each man took a certain pride in upholding the reputation of the office.'

"Mr. Perry has served under 11 postmasters, 7 Republicans and 4 Democrats. He has seen the office grow from a small shack in the sand dunes to a three-million granite edifice. He watched the force increase from 17 men to more than 1,000 employees, while the receipts have climbed in his time from a few thousand dollars annually up to the four million mark.

"Mr. Perry has worked in numerous capacities. He was a distributor, a railway mail clerk, a registry expert, and an executive, doing each successive duty in a capable and conscientious manner. It wasn't a spectacular work. The public never knew it was being done. Yet it was a useful and necessary work. For it is the knowledge and the skill of the John Perrys—the unseen, unknown postal clerks at work night and day, Sundays, and holidays—that makes possible the expeditious and proper dispatch and receipt of the Nation's mail.

"Old Father Time—inexorable time they call him—played no favorite with young Perry. Jack's—he was Jack in those days—eyes became dimmed. It was nothing. A pair of glasses soon remedied that defect. His once strong, skillful hands—the hands that distributed mail on the difficult Soledad case with lightning rapidity and with cannylike accuracy—became palsied. His step, the step that once flew around the office with the sprightliness of youth, became heavy. Jack was growing old. By gradual evolution young Jack become old man Perry. His former comrades dropped by the wayside. The younger generation shouldered him aside.

"Easier duties were found for him. His fund of knowledge of the Postal Service was utilized at a minimum loss of energy to himself. Then came a new order of things. The European war or something equally dreadful made it imperative that the old men give way and make room for the clamorous youths on the substitute lists. High departmental chiefs gave out the word that hereafter employees must render "quid pro quo." The department, so the order went, was not responsible for the superannuated clerks being still alive. The department's chief duty to the public, this was the inference taken from the position of the high chiefs, was to show a healthy money surplus. Let no John Perrys stand in the way of that duty. Until Congress saw fit to recognize the need of legislation to care for the aged men who had given all to the service, the department was under no obligations to show any mercy.

"Veteran clerks in Washington, D. C., the model office of the country, were summarily dismissed. Aged mail collectors were compelled to accept either dismissal or a wage reduction. The old men of the service—the husky youths of yesterday—felt themselves on trial for their very lives. John Perry was assigned to more arduous duties—duties that were difficult for eyes that were dimmed and hands that shook after nearly a half century of service for the Government. He protested; he pleaded that he at least be permitted to serve out his 50 years of service without suffering the ignominy of being dismissed. His pleas were heeded.

"On October 16, 1915, 'old man' Perry, physically much different than 'young Jack' of 1865, wrapped his skull cap and his apron in a newspaper, recorded his time of departure, said good-by to his colleagues, and walked out of the office—and probably out of the service—that he entered 50 years previous. He left behind him an unblemished record for honesty, ability, integrity, and probity. He took with him the kindly wishes of all with whom he worked.

"Mr. Perry is hopeful that the next Congress will come to his rescue with some form of retirement legislation for the civil-service veterans. We all share the hope. In the midst of the present hysteria over war preparedness our national legislators could probably find time to show some recognition for the heroes of peace—the diligent, faithful, worthy John Perrys, whose efforts have so largely contributed to the upbuilding of the mail service of the United States."

I also wish to call your thoughtful attention to this account of a Chicago letter carrier who was forced to resign after 43 years of meritorious service:

[From the Chicago Tribune.]

"CARRIES THE MAIL 43 YEARS, THEN TAGGED 'TOO OLD'—JOHN JACOBSON, LONG GIVEN HARDEST ROUTES IN CITY, QUITS WHEN HIS SALARY IS CUT.

"Many years ago, when Chicago had only 43 mail carriers, the United States Post Office authorities demonstrated their alertness to increase the efficiency of their department by giving young John Jacobson the hardest route in the city. In those days the post office was in the basement of the old Presbyterian Church at Harrison and Wabash Avenues.

"There were no elevators or mail chutes, and the carriers had to climb the stairs. Young Jacobson was the hardiest and the most active of the entire force. He was given the route which included the tallest buildings then in Chicago. On just one block, in Monroe Street, between Clark and Dearborn, young Jacobson climbed 82 flights of stairs five times daily.

"That he was efficient was evidenced by the fact that as bigger buildings went up and the business of the town changed from one street to another Jacobson was shifted so that he still had the routes demanding the most stamina. When elevators came and buildings were doubled in height Jacobson was given these routes. With the advent of the skyscrapers the carrier system of carrying was changed so that one man was assigned to a building.

"HE'S NOT A CARRIER NOW.

"At present some buildings have several carriers. John Jacobson, however, is not one of them. Last March the Post Office Department, ever watchful to maintain its efficiency, shifted Jacobson again. It was done to test the efficiency of Jacobson, who was finishing his forty-third year as a substitute and a regular carrier.

"He was given a route embracing eight blocks in a section of Austin where few sidewalks have been built. He had been accustomed to hard work for 43 years and he said nothing. He walked the route twice each day. Then, on March 14 he was 20 minutes late in reporting for duty. He says it was the first time he had been tardy in 43 years. He later discovered that his tardiness had cost him 20 demerits—one demerit for each minute.

WASHINGTON GETS REPORT.

"One week later he received a copy of a letter which had been sent to the Postmaster General at Washington. The letter, signed by Postmaster D. A. Campbell, in part follows:

"'The attention of the department is respectfully invited to the case of Carrier John Jacobson, of the delivery division, assigned to the main post office, whose roster follows:

"'Date of birth, December 17, 1846.
"'Birthplace, Sweden.
"'Color, white.
"'Previous occupation, none.
"'Date of appointment, December 1, 1873.
"'Roster title, carrier.
"'Salary, $1,200.

"'The superintendent of delivery, in a report to this office, states that owing to advanced age of Mr. Jacobson and infirmities resulting therefrom he is not capable of carrying an average district, and that it has been necessary to lay out a special district for him to keep him within the eight-hour limit.

"'In view of the facts as stated, the superintendent of delivery recommends that the salary of John Jacobson be reduced from $1,200 to $1,000, to take effect April 15, in which recommendation this office concurs.'

THEN JACOBSON QUITS.

"Mr. Jacobson thought over the letter and reduction in salary for several months. Then, on November 23, he sent the following letter to Postmaster General Burleson:

"'DEAR SIR: After 43 years of service as mail carrier in the Chicago post office my salary has been reduced from $1,200 to $1,000. The only charge being 20 demerits for reporting late.

"'Since above date I have been transferred to Austin station, "making good," as my record will show, on a district heretofore held by a $1,200-a-year man.

"'If this be the reward of faithful service to the Government for 43 years, I respectfully tender my resignation to you, Mr. Postmaster General, to take effect at the close of day on November 30, 1915, and pay due tribute to those of you who may serve the Government honestly, faithfully, and loyally for many years only to be subjects of ostracism in the end.'"

I ask in conclusion that you continue to give your thought and efforts to an early solution of this momentous question of retirement for superannuated postal workers. From the experience gained in your home State of Massachusetts, where the problem has been met and legislation enacted, you know that from a humane, as well as a strictly business, view the aged men of the Postal Service should be given the relief they are seeking and to which they are justly entitled.

With sincere appreciation of your interest and activity, I am,

Respectfully, yours,

THOS. F. FLAHERTY,
Secretary-Treasurer
National Federation of Post Office Clerks.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing in the RECORD a communication from the State Department relative to the bill to reimburse parties who contributed money to pay the ransom of Miss Ellen M. Stone, the American missionary.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD for the purposes indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PAIGE].

Mr. PAIGE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, my colleague [Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts] has pictured the trials, perplexities, and inconveniences experienced by the people in his district, and lest my constituents, who have suffered as much, if not more, by the changes in the rural-mail delivery, should feel that their complaints were not made known at this time I desire to cite a few instances of how the changes have worked in my district. And let me say, in passing, that the letter from the department placed in the RECORD by the distinguished chairman of the committee [Mr. MOON], for whom I have a high regard, not only for his ability, experience, and earnest desire, as he views it, to frame a bill that shall be alike fair and equitable to both the Government and the people it serves, is misleading in this respect, if it is intended to show a list of the towns affected by the changes in the rural mail service, as nine towns in my district that are affected do not appear in the list at all. It is not the difference in the distances covered by the different rural mail routes that has caused the trouble, as I shall show, but, rather, the changing of routes caused by it. In making the changes the routes may not be materially lengthened, but they have been changed so that many who before these changes went into effect had been satisfactorily served have been incommoded, and I desire here and now to call the attention of the committee to a few out of the many complaints I have received.

I represent a congressional district that includes 48 towns and 2 cities. Most of these towns are agricultural communities and many of them are served by rural routes that start from the cities or the larger towns, while in others the rural routes have their origin in the post offices at the centers of these several villages. Since last November my congressional mail has been made up largely of letters expressing the great dissatisfaction with conditions brought about by the elimination of long-established routes and the readjustment of routes with others. Some are deprived of delivery service, or, if they have it at all, they are forced to go anywhere from a few hundred feet to a mile and a half to get their mail. Others have gone back to the box system, as they do not care to have their mail left by a carrier at a point a long distance from their houses and where there is nobody within a reasonable distance to see that it is not taken by somebody to whom it does not belong.

The manner in which some of the changes were arranged in the district seems most unreasonable. Here is one case that occurred. A change was made on amended route No. 1 from the Westminster post office, whereby the carrier was compelled to go a distance of 4,615.2 feet—almost a mile—and return, making altogether a distance of a mile and three-quarters in order to serve two families; while on the Hubbardston route, which is also in my district, they cut off the carrier from going about 600 feet less than the above-mentioned distance in the Westminster case cited, and a retrace of the same distance, where he served 21 families. And yet, according to information given out by the post-office authorities, all of these proposed changes were inspected before they were put into operation. The work was done very inefficiently.

Rural route No. 1, from the Gardner post office, was laid out by the new arrangement to run over what is known as the Partridgeville Road. I am told by those living in that vicinity that there are many days in the course of a year when this road is absolutely impassable. Residents in that section never think of resorting to its use, except in the dry season; and yet the orders given out by the Post Office Department when these changes were made laid the route out so that the carrier must traverse this road each week day.

As an instance of how carefully the old routes must have been investigated I want to read a letter from a patron of the rural route in East Brookfield. I read:

EAST BROOKFIELD, MASS., January 10, 1916.

HON. CALVIN D. PAIGE,
Washington, D. C.:

Yours of the 6th instant received to-day, and in reply would say this route was previously served by horses, and during my residence of seven years I never failed to receive my daily mail until this change. The two weeks I spoke of were unsatisfactory, for the reason that no plans had been made to deliver when an auto could not be used and the carrier had not any way to deliver. I do not think we should suffer in our service because the carrier did not have a horse.

When they made these changes they reversed the route, making the first deliveries on the other end, which was bad enough, but, in addition, they added 3 miles of the worst road in town in the winter and spring, and which has very little travel. This 3 miles gives delivery to four houses in the winter, and to reach them the carrier has more than a mile to go past Quaboag Lake, where it drifts badly every storm, and when the spring freshets come it is nearly impassable. If this stretch of road was given to the Brookfield man, he would reach all four houses and save 2 miles of the route. I think a rearrangement would save distance for this carrier and give us better service. I do not know why they changed the route anyway. I came here from the city and bought this farm, because I knew I could get a morning delivery; and then to have it arbitrarily changed, without any known reason, so that I get my newspapers at night, hits me a hard blow. In good weather and the roads in good order the carrier can get here from 12 noon to 1 p. m., but many days it is 2 and 3 o'clock or later. He is trying to cover the route with his auto and one horse now, but if his horse gets a little thinner the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals will get him sure.

When it gets so that the United States of America has to give rotten service just to save a little money, and then a Democratic Congress spends more money than any other ever did, it is time something was done. I am a Republican, and voted for Wilson, but if the Lord will forgive me this time, I will never do it again.

Very truly, yours.

HARRY G. IVES.

P. S.—If you desire, I can send you any amount of names of dissatisfied patrons on this route and others. Some have discontinued their boxes on account of poor service.

H. G. I.

I tried in vain to secure a rearrangement of the route in Brookfield upon which Capt. Horace B. Parker lives. A liberally signed petition was forwarded to the department, together with a map showing the territory to be served, and later on a request was made for a temporary order that would allow the carrier to deliver the mail to these patrons who petitioned, but no replies were received by the petitioners for a period of almost three months, when I succeeded in getting a decision to the effect that the petition could not be granted. It meant an addition of 2¼ miles net to an auto route, and Capt. Parker, one of the petitioners, informed me in his letter that his postage bill was more than $100 per annum, as he is connected with the pay department of the Massachusetts Volunteer Militia, and has a vast amount of correspondence, in the dispatch of which he was seriously interfered with by the ruling of the department. The firm of Parker Bros., large fruit growers, and large mail receivers and dispatchers, were also affected by this ruling, as were many families.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. PAIGE of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman was speaking of complaints and about people being inconvenienced by these changes?

Mr. PAIGE of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Is it not true that there have been a number of extensions of rural service in the gentleman's State? Would he not call the attention of the people and of the House to those extensions of the Rural Mail Service to people who had not had it before?

Mr. PAIGE of Massachusetts. I have received no commendations as to that service. Mine are all complaints.

Mr. BORLAND. I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in the hearings it is developed that 167 routes have been extended.

Mr. PAIGE of Massachusetts. That is not in my district.

Mr. BORLAND. That is in the State of Massachusetts that the gentleman represents. There were 167 extensions of rural mail.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAIGE of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Perhaps the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], who was last inquiring of the gentleman, referred to the extensions of routes that made them too long for the carriers to serve them. I have a number of extensions of that kind in my own State.

Mr. PAIGE of Massachusetts. Yes. One of the most inexcusable changes was that made at Jefferson, an important manufacturing village in the town of Holden, where, by reason of excellent train service between Boston, Northampton, and Worcester, and with an electric line running direct to Jefferson from the latter city, the people of that busy village had long enjoyed excellent mail service. The electric cars from Worcester run hourly, while half a dozen trains pass within a short distance of the post office each day to and from Boston and Northampton, and yet the department declared it to be the part of wisdom to change the route so as to have the mail delivered by the carrier from the Rutland post office, 8 miles away, and the outgoing mails sent from there also, notwithstanding the fact that the Rutland post office was much less favorably situated with reference to the railroad than Jefferson. Any person acquainted with the situation would not hesitate a moment in declaring Jefferson much superior to the Rutland office as a distributing point for the operation of the rural service, but the department announced otherwise in a letter to me, in which it was stated that it was thought that route No. 1 from Jefferson could be dispensed with, and the patrons could be provided "by an extension of the service from Rutland, a presidential office, believed to be capable of providing a more satisfactory service than is possible through an office of the fourth class at Jefferson."

The number of mails received and dispatched from the Rutland office daily was not to be compared with the number received and dispatched from Jefferson, even though the latter was only a fourth-class office, and the confusion of changing the addresses of patrons of the old route raised a general protest that was far-reaching.

Two routes were combined at Ashby, making the new route 28.7 miles in length, but omitting some patrons who had been served by the rural service previously, and I am credibly informed that as late as the first of the current month it had been found as the result of the experiment that it is next to impossible for the carrier to cover the route and get around to the post office at Ashby in time for the mail which he has collected to leave the office the same day it is received, a condition which it appears to me is entirely unfair to the residents of that town. I am informed that the carrier reports to the office at 8 a. m., and that the only way he can avoid coming back to the office so late as to necessitate the mail lying over in the office until the day following its collection is for him to employ his wife to assist him, as the outgoing mail leaves the Ashby post office at 5.30 p. m.

As the result of the change at Ashby, two routes in which the carriers were fairly paid, and in the success of which they were personally interested, have been made into one that has required all the way from 10½ hours to 12¾ hours to cover, the average time for the month of January having been 11 hours and 10 minutes. The one carrier now employed is obliged to keep another horse and wagon, and as compensation for this investment and for the board of his horse he receives from Uncle Sam the munificent sum of $4 per month more than he formerly received under the former arrangement. At the Ashby office the substitute is the wife of the regular carrier, and in order that the route might be properly covered this woman has tried, but without much success, to help out the unfortunate situation produced by these rearrangements of routes in that town.

The people living in the rural sections of the district I represent resent the changed conditions. Moreover, the changes have impaired the efficiency of the service. These people living in the country districts want rural free delivery; they want it regularly, and they want it as promptly as the train service in their respective localities will permit; they want the carriers well paid for the work, and they want them to have reasonable hours; they pay their share toward the running expenses of the Government, and they are entitled to reasonable post-office service.

I believe one of the greatest assets this country can have is a contented rural population, and no one agency has contributed so much toward that end as has the Rural Free Delivery Service as it was formerly operated.

The Ashby route, to which I have alluded, might be covered, as it now exists for seven or eight months of the year, with an automobile, but even then horses must be kept or hired for use the other months of each year. As it is now, many people who live on the routes, and who were formerly served directly, have to go from half a mile to a mile and a half to the corners of crossroads in order to get their mail, instead of having it left at their door, as was the case under former conditions.

In view of the changes made in the Westminster and Hubbardston routes, which I have recently alluded to, where the carrier was made to go nearly a mile and three-quarters to serve two families, while another was prevented from going a mile and a half to serve 21 families, I want to show the absurdity of some of these unreasonable alterations in routes, and in order to do so I am going to incorporate a letter I received from one person who was affected. It is one of those pathetic appeals that all of you have doubtless received, and it shows how, by a little scientific management, many families who formerly had their mail delivered, and who are now being deprived of that service, might well be accommodated:

GARDNER, MASS., December 6, 1915.

Hon. CALVIN D. PAIGE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Will you kindly help me out of this difficulty in taking away our mail delivery. I live on what is termed Happy Hollow Road—the William Shaw place. We came here through the advice of the doctors in the Massachusetts General Hospital. I am the breadwinner, depending wholly upon the parcel post and the United States mail for support. One-eighth of a mile would cover the distance both ways in order to give us mail, and only one stop, as the neighbors would use my box. Everything would be in readiness, thus saving any delay. Having chronic neuritis myself I am unable to go out but little in cold and inclement weather. We are expecting that my husband will be obliged to go back to the hospital at almost any time. Mr. PAIGE, please do help us out in this all-important matter. I refer you to the postmaster of Gardner.

Very respectfully,

Mrs. T. W. THORPE.

Here is a concrete example of a case where an urban family had gone to the country in the hopes of better health for the husband, and with rural free delivery coming to their door each day the family felt it could still be in touch with the world, when suddenly, as in the twinkling of an eye, all this was cut off, and the wife, herself obliged to use care in order that her own health should not be jeopardized, is left to walk to the nearest point to which the mail is delivered under the new arrangement or be dependent upon some kind neighbor to bring it when an opportunity afforded.

I received a petition late in November from 679 persons who received mail on route No. 1 in Rutland, where is located a Massachusetts State sanatorium, a route on which, according to the figures when the mail was last counted, showed that 20,181 pieces of mail were delivered and 5,572 collected; that the weight of those delivered was 5,508 pounds, and of those collected 423 pounds. I found upon investigation that where—up to the time the changes were made—the people on this route had been receiving their mail in the morning, the bulk of them who were located at the sanatorium were not getting their mail until late in the afternoon. I also learned that as a result of the change there was no substitute carrier on route No. 2, and that the regular carrier on this route was assigned to deliver all of the heavy pieces of mail on route No. 1; that he was working from 7.30 a. m. until 7 p. m. and was covering 31½ miles per day, and that the mail he collected on either route 1 or route 2 could not leave the Rutland post office until 9.11 the following day after its collection. The embarrassment occasioned by the change on route 1 was working disastrously to the interests of the officials and patients at the sanatorium, as the former who were dependent to a great extent upon supplies from Boston could not get a letter from that city until late in the afternoon, and if it required immediate reply they would either be forced to carry the reply to the post office a mile or more distant or wait until the carrier came the following afternoon, and then the letter would lie in the post office until the following morning, this making three days from the time they got the letter to the time when their reply started for Boston.

This route was apparently so objectionable it was readjusted, the time of delivery being reversed. A similar condition existed at North Rutland where there is a mill and where the business letters of the firm under the new arrangement did not reach the office until late in the afternoon. This route was also rearranged satisfactorily.

A petition signed by practically every patron of what was formerly route No. 1 of the Pratts Junction route in the town of Sterling received no consideration at the hands of the department beyond a statement to the effect that only a few persons affected by the change would be obliged to change the location of their boxes and "but few instances where the post-office address will be affected, as the routes from Lancaster and Leominster have been arranged so as to require the carrier on both of these routes to proceed direct to Pratts Junction and there receive from the postmaster mail addressed to patrons of the discontinued route."

Pratts Junction is about halfway between the Lancaster and Leominster offices referred to, and the post office at Pratts Junction was less than 200 feet from the station and was presided over by the station agent of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, the depot being just across the road from the post office. The Pratts Junction route had long been in operation, having been one of the first established in Massachusetts, and as a result of the change the postmaster at Pratts Junction sent in his resignation, as he felt he could not longer carry on the office. Since that resignation went into effect I understand one examination has been held, with no applicants, and that another has been ordered. It seems hardly probable, however, that anybody will care to assume the office with the conditions as they are, as the former postmaster owns the building in which the post office is located, and there is no other suitable structure in the vicinity, and this will mean that the 79 families, numbering 285 persons, who formerly had their post-office address at Pratts Junction will now be forced to change the same to Lancaster or Leominster. Some of them, of course, by the readjustment are not being served at all and others at great inconvenience, as they have to travel various distances to get the mail which up to the time of the change was delivered directly to their homes.

The rural route at Petersham was discontinued by the new arrangement, the North Dana route having been extended some 8 miles, cutting out Petersham and making the distance for the North Dana carrier about 33 miles, which distance, I am credibly informed by some of the people living on the route, can not be covered by team service six days in a week, and surely not in the winter season over the New England hills. Early in December last autos had to be taken out of service on the roads covered by the North Dana carrier, and that made it necessary to transport the mails by teams. I understand that the carrier on that route was only able to make the entire trip on one day of six working days during the week of December 13 last, while some of the patrons received no mail service for four days of that week.

Last June the department decided to abolish the post office at North Leominster, which village is one of the most important parts of the city of Leominster, in the third Massachusetts congressional district. This office had been in existence for more than 50 years, and it served the George W. Wheelwright Paper Co., a large concern employing several hundred hands; Merriam, Hall & Co., manufacturers of bedroom furniture; Harrison & Co., leather manufacturers; the Elmwood Poultry Farm (Inc.), who do a large amount of business by mail; Louis M. Newhall, whose business six months of the year is the second largest handled at the old office, and thousands of people who worked for the above concerns and who lived in the vicinity of the North Leominster office. I went to North Leominster and investigated the conditions and found that the office served a large number of people; that it was almost an indispensable thing for the people of that section of the city to have it in operation; and that the manufacturers and the employees would be put to great inconvenience by being served from the Leominster post office proper. I appealed to the First Assistant Postmaster General asking for a stay in the order for an investigation and review of the case, but all to no avail, as I was informed by the department that the sum of $435 would be saved annually by the change.

Matters have worked out just as anticipated at the time. The patrons who were formerly served by the carriers from the North Leominster office and who had enjoyed for 12 years before its abolition two deliveries a day are now receiving, under the new arrangement of sending the carriers from the Leominster office, only two deliveries each day, while the ground covered by the carrier from the Leominster center office is not as great as that which was covered by the carriers from the old North Leominster office, undoubtedly because of the fact that the carrier has to take out the time consumed to make the trip from the Leominster office to the North Leominster section, and back again, a distance of 3 miles. I am credibly informed that people who formerly were served by the old North Leominster office got their mail from one to three hours earlier than they do under the new arrangement, while people living at the termini of the two former delivery routes have been forced to give their residence as Fitchburg, although they are in fact residents of Main Street, Leominster, which change causes no end of confusion, inasmuch as these people are supposed by correspondents to live in the city where their mail is addressed, and the city of Fitchburg is a separate municipality from the city of Leominster, bordering on one part of the latter city. These same people now have to rely upon the rural service, where they previously had two free city deliveries. Some former patrons, rather than subject themselves to the delays occasioned by the change, have their mail left at the drug store at North Leominster and call for it themselves.

The Boston & Maine Railroad main line passes directly through North Leominster, within a stone's throw of the former North Leominster post office, and it is the chief mail line through that section of Massachusetts. The Leominster center post office from which these people are served is almost 3 miles distant, and teams have to be hired to take the early morning mail, soon after 5 o'clock every morning, from the North Leominster depot to the Leominster post office, and carriers sent for it at other times of the day. All of the mail for the North Leominster section thus has to make an extra 5-mile trip on the arrival of each mail before it can be put into delivery. I am told by some of these manufacturers that they have many important letters and invoices which must be mailed late in the afternoon of each business day, and which they were formerly able to get out when they had the North Leominster office without the slightest trouble or inconvenience, but which now either have to lay over until the following day, or have to be taken by them to the Leominster center office, which is exceedingly inconvenient and at times impossible. The Wheelwright Co., above alluded to, inform me that before the substation was abolished they had their business mail at their office by 7.30 each morning, ready for distribution, and their afternoon mail by 4 o'clock. They now receive their mail an hour after the time they formerly received it when there was a post office at North Leominster, as the mail carrier does not reach the plant until after 9, and sometimes nearer 10, under the new arrangement. The mail which they were accustomed to receive at the North Leominster office at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, even if it reaches the Leominster center office as early as it formerly reached the mill office, can not be delivered at their office until 5, which is the closing time of business.

Certainly, any such change as was brought about at North Leominster was shortsighted and ill advised, and resulted in serious impairment of the mail facilities of several thousand people, to say nothing of retarding the efficiency of several manufacturing plants upon the existence of which that section of the city largely depends. It is difficult to discover upon what basis the department could have worked in this instance, for the saving effected is in no sense commensurate with the impairment of the mail service in that section.

The changes in Leominster are not confined to the North Leominster office. I am in receipt of a letter from a resident of that city who has lived there 25 years, stating that since the Sterling route, a rural route, has been discontinued, and part of it has been added to rural route No. 1 from the Leominster office the patrons have enjoyed (?) a ragtime schedule. They do not blame the carrier in any way, as he is forced to cover 30 miles a day with a horse. "We receive our mail all times of the day, and sometimes not for one or two days, which never happened before the change," writes my correspondent.

From Charlton, North Brookfield, and other parts of my district come reports of just such conditions as I have described, until it seems as if the rural free delivery in our section of the country had lost its former efficiency, a result of this condition existing in the rural mail service in the third Massachusetts congressional district that has caused more dissatisfaction than any one thing that has occurred; and if it is proposed to change the rural routes as they were before these changes were made or to provide satisfactory service to this populous section of Massachusetts it will carry comfort and hope to many deserving people who are deserving of service equal to that enjoyed by any people under like conditions.

In closing let me say that I can not agree fully with the rest of the Post Office Committee that the space basis for carrying the mails on the railroads is the most equitable that could be devised, notwithstanding that the bill gives to the railroads of the country some $3,000,000 more than the old rate; but I will not discuss that feature of the bill at this time. [Applause.]

I ask leave to extend my remarks, and yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, how much time has the gentleman yielded back?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has yielded back seven minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRIEST] 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRIEST] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. GRIEST. Mr. Chairman, the post-office business of the United States Government is the biggest business in America, public or private. Like the growth of our country, the growth of this business has been marvelous. The first appropriation by Congress for the full support of the Post Office Department was in 1837, 79 years ago. Prior to that year Congress appropriated only in the event of a deficit and for the amount of that deficit. The entire appropriation for the year 1837 was $3,500,000. The pending appropriation bill carries $320,000,000. It is well described by my colleague [Mr. STEENERSON] as the largest appropriation bill ever introduced into the American Congress. This vast sum is for the maintenance and extension of this great business, and the appropriation and expenditure of so large an amount of money well warrants the concern and attention of Members of this body. General features of this bill have been ably and fully presented by my committee colleagues, and I shall refer only to a few matters that now seem pertinent for presentation.

In his opening remarks, outlining the provisions of the pending measure, Judge MOON, chairman of the Post Office Committee, said:

> The committee is satisfied that there has been sufficient experiment in the village delivery service. The sum of $200,000 has been appropriated heretofore for several sessions for experiments. The experiments have proven not only very successful but very beneficial to the villages. They have brought about an improvement in the lighting of the towns and an improvement in the pavements and sidewalks, and better conditions generally; and the committee now have an amendment striking out the word "experimental," so as to make this service a continuous service like any other service connected with the department. We have not, however, for this fiscal year raised the amount beyond $200,000.

I wish to refer more at length to this matter, and will endeavor to bring down to date the facts and development of this unique service.

The so-called town and village mail delivery is now in operation in 134 cities, boroughs, and villages of this country. It is admittedly a pronounced success. The paragraph in the bill referring to it is as follows:

> For village delivery service in towns and villages having post offices of the second or third class, $200,000.

During the past sessions of Congress departmental influences endeavored to suppress this service, but both the House and the Senate wisely determined upon the continuance of the appropriation, because Congressmen had made personal inquiries and found that the experimental mail delivery was a success; that it had been of great civic and commercial benefit to the towns; and that increased postal receipts had generally resulted.

This village mail delivery service, as it is called, accommodates people who do not have city delivery or rural delivery. As an intermediate service it removes the discrimination which has naturally developed against people in towns of less than 10,000 population, which have second and third class post offices, where patrons must go to the post office to deposit or secure mail. The third-class offices have annual gross postal receipts of $1,900 to $8,000, and the second-class offices of $8,000 to $40,000. The post offices in these towns return to the Government profit of thousands of dollars a year, and it is but just that the Government shall expend a small part of this profit by providing for the people of such towns desirable mail facilities.

The service supplied under this appropriation has been so very acceptable to the patrons of the offices affected that they are substantially unanimous in their insistence upon its continuance. I am glad to say also that while in the last Congress the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General declared this service to be "rather a dubious postal proposition," he has this year, at the hearings before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, admitted that the service ought to be continued; that the department will encourage this class of delivery; and the Postmaster General, in his annual report, also reverses his position with regard to this service, now admitting that in towns where the receipts exceed $5,000 the "service is warranted."

Your Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has, therefore, considered that inasmuch as the service has been experimentally conducted for four years and proven itself to be successful and of undoubted public benefit and more economically administered than either the City Delivery Service or the Rural Delivery Service, that the word "experimental" should be stricken from the paragraph.

The section as recommended by the committee should meet with the approval of all who believe in extending to the public that expedition, certainty, and celerity of the mail service which the Government guaranteed the people when it assumed monopoly of the mail business.

It has been suggested by those who were at one time not in sympathy with this service that the unit of measurement for the establishment of City Delivery Service be reduced from $10,000 to $7,500 or $5,000, and that further experiment with village delivery as now authorized be discontinued. Such action would result in the continuance of unfair discrimination, and would make it far more costly to serve a given number of towns than would result from the operation of an intermediate system of mail delivery, as at present, between the City Delivery and Rural Delivery Systems. The average cost per carrier in the City Delivery Service is about $1,130 per annum. The Fourth Assistant Postmaster General reports the average salary paid the 180 carriers in the village delivery service as $600 per annum; hence it will be seen that even if these carriers in the towns were paid $720 or $840 per year the carrier cost of the service in the towns would be much less than it must necessarily be in the larger cities where the expenses of the carriers are far greater.

There are 533 first-class post offices and 2,138 second-class offices in the United States. All of the first-class offices and 1,275 second-class offices have city delivery service. Most of the 863 second-class offices and about 1,500 third-class offices have more than 1,000 population. All of these offices, as previously stated, are profit producers, and return funds to the general postal revenues. The people who are patrons of such offices are fairly entitled to receive the benefits which are derived from modern mail delivery and collection facilities.

In the cities, carriers deliver mail on routes having 500 to 2,000 patrons. On the rural routes the regulations require that there shall be at least 100 families, and there are usually from 200 to 1,000 patrons. It is therefore unreasonable to deprive the people in the towns of less than 10,000 population of a daily delivery of their mail. These people are patrons of post offices having gross receipts between $2,000 and $8,000, and a reasonable expenditure for carrier service will continue to return a substantial margin of profit to the general postal revenues. Furthermore, the history of the Postal Service has shown that every wise extension of the system to benefit the people has resulted in an increase of postal revenues and profits.

Estimates have been made as to the cost of extending a system such as the village delivery to all the towns which would be eligible, and the First Assistant Postmaster General in 1912 reported that a "conservative satisfactory mail delivery at all second and third class offices will cost the Government ultimately $10,000,000 a year." That expense would provide mail-delivery service for fully 15,000,000 people, and as it would require several years before the system could be completely extended, the gradual development could not become a heavy charge against the operating expenses. In any event the appropriation for this service is controlled absolutely by Congress, and can be increased or decreased or remain as now, as this body shall will.

As was stated in my remarks last year, not since the establishment of the Rural Delivery Service, nearly a score of years ago, has the Congress authorized a postal service which carries such great comfort and benefits to the homes of our people as can be provided by mail-delivery service in these towns. Congress has given city delivery to fully 50,000,000 people, and rural delivery to fully 22,000,000, at an expense of about $80,000,000 annually, and there are numerous and sufficient reasons why life shall be made more comfortable and convenient for the millions of people who reside in our active and prosperous towns of less than 10,000 population. [Applause.]

My remarks in the RECORD of February 24, 1910, April 16, 1912, and January 16, 1914, contain considerable data favorable to this extension of modern mail-delivery facilities, and as a further evidence of proof that there is in reality as wide a public demand for the delivery of mail in towns of less than 10,000 population as there is in the cities and rural districts I have secured quite recently, through the courtesy of colleagues in this House, facts and expressions of opinion from business men and other prominent men who are patrons of the post offices at which the village mail delivery service is in operation. A synopsis of these reports has been prepared, and, with the permission of the House, it will be included in the RECORD as a part of my remarks. These reports, which Congressmen have kindly obtained from persons in whom they have implicit confidence, refer in glowing terms to the success of the experiment. They describe the service as a "howling success," "decidedly beneficial to the town," "satisfactory to a high degree," "greatly appreciated by the people," "of civic and business benefit," and that "it would be going backward to have it discontinued, and the people would resent it."

The reports, stated briefly, are as follows:

Florala, Ala., in the congressional district of Hon. S. H. DENT, Jr., is a town of 3,500 people. Mr. DENT secured information concerning experimental mail delivery service from Mr. T. A. Goodwin, of Florala, who says that the postal receipts have increased about $50 per month; that the town has benefited; and that the people want the service made permanent.

Piedmont, Ala., is in the congressional district of Hon. FRED. L. BLACKMON, who has been greatly interested in the village mail delivery service and obtained a report from Mr. E. D. McClelen, of Piedmont. His correspondent states that the people want the village mail delivery continued, as it has been of postal, business, and civic value to the town. Congressman BLACKMON, as a member of the Post Office Committee, has given this service particular attention, and writes that he is satisfied that the mail delivery system should be continued and materially extended.

Tempe, Ariz., located in the district of Hon. CARL HAYDEN, is a town of 1,500 people. From Mayor George M. Frizzel Congressman HAYDEN learned that the mail delivery service had "decidedly benefited the town"; that the people would oppose its discontinuance; and that "a great many of the people who are being served would have to go or send from one-half mile to a mile or more every day to get their mail if they did not have delivery."

Van Buren, Ark., is represented by Hon. OTIS WINGO, who has secured a report to the effect that postal receipts have increased about 10 per cent; that the town has been benefited; and that the people want the service continued.

Littleton, Colo., in the district represented by Hon. CHARLES B. TIMBERLAKE, is a town of about a thousand people. Mr. TIMBERLAKE secured a report from Mr. E. H. Albertson, who says that the postal receipts at Littleton have increased since the mail delivery service was established; that the town has been benefited; and that the public want the service continued.

Hawkinsville, Ga., is in the congressional district of Hon. DUDLEY M. HUGHES, who reports that the village mail delivery is a decided success at Hawkinsville and is a great convenience to the people there. In numerous communications from prominent residents of Hawkinsville there are expressed various and substantial arguments favoring the continuance and extension of the village mail delivery service. The president of the chamber of commerce, the superintendent of the schools, and others prominent in the life of the community of Hawkinsville are of the opinion that the village delivery is a great convenience to the people and of much benefit to the town. All of the communications give evidence of a unanimous demand for the service.

St. Maries, Idaho, is the only community from which a note of indifference as to the value of the service was received, the editor of a newspaper stating that his postage bill had been increased by mail delivery, and he could see no benefit as a business man.

Georgetown, Ill., ably represented by the Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON, is a town of more than 3,000 people. Mr. O. P. Clark reported to the former Speaker that the village mail delivery had benefited the town and that the people want the service continued. Mr. Clark says that while there has been some falling off in the receipts at the post office during the past couple of years, that was due to the general conditions in the coal-mining industry.

Homer, Ill., is situated in the district of Hon. WILLIAM B. MCKINLEY. Congressman MCKINLEY secured from Mr. H. J. Wiggins information as to the operation of the service in Homer, and it is said that all the people of the town want the service continued, as they believe it to be of great civic and business value to the community.

Pinckneyville, Ill., located in the district of Hon. E. E. DENISON, reports, through Mr. DENISON, that the mail delivery helped to increase the receipts of the post office, and that the patrons of the office would not do without the mail-carrier service. It is reported that the mail delivery enables the post-office people to increase their efficiency at the stamp, money-order, and registry windows, and, if the service were discontinued, it would require more clerks in the office and would be a step backward in the efficiency of the Post Office Department.

Mitchell, Ind., represented by Hon. W. E. COX, a member of the Post Office Committee, who has given much time and study to postal problems, reports that the village delivery at that place has been a success.

Garrett, Ind., located in the congressional district represented by Hon. CYRUS CLINE, is a town of about 4,700 people. In a report furnished Congressman CLINE by Mr. C. B. Hamilton it is stated that the village mail delivery has benefited the town; that the people would not be satisfied to have the system discontinued; that the service is of importance to the civic and business welfare of the town; that the people are more than pleased with it; that it "would be going backward to have it discontinued, and the people would resent it."

Rockport, Ind., is in the congressional district of Hon. CHARLES LIEB, and has a population of about 2,700 people. In a report from a prominent citizen, submitted through Mr. LIEB, it is stated that since the establishment of the village mail delivery the receipts of the post office at Rockport have increased about 6 per cent; that the service has benefited the town, it being of importance both to the civic and business welfare of the community; and that the patrons would not be satisfied to have the service discontinued. The report also states that mail is now being delivered to patrons who would not call at the office, which mail otherwise would be sent to the Dead Letter Office; and since the establishment of mail delivery the dead-letter list at the Rockport office has diminished from an average of from 25 to 30 letters weekly to 1 or 2 a week.

Seymour, Iowa, represented by Hon. H. M. TOWNER, has a population of about 1,100 people. Congressman TOWNER secured information concerning the village delivery service at Seymour which shows that it has proven beneficial to the town and that the people appreciate the service.

Coon Rapids, Iowa, is in the congressional district represented by Hon. FRANK P. WOODS. The Congressman reports that the postal receipts at Coon Rapids have increased since the establishment of the village mail delivery there; that the service has benefited the town; and that most of the people, particularly the business men of the community, are desirous to have the mail delivery continued.

A letter concerning this service from Mr. E. McDonald, president of the First National Bank of Coon Rapids, is convincing evidence of the popularity of the mail delivery service in that town:

"I have heard some talk of possibly discontinuing the city mail delivery in Coon Rapids. Now, I wish to enter my protest against any such action. We have never had any service in Coon Rapids that is more appreciated by the citizens than the mail delivery. I wish you would do everything possible to have this mail service continued and made permanent. I am sure that I voice the sentiment of 98 per cent of the citizens when I say that it is the most appreciated service that we have ever had in our community."

Lenox, Iowa, which is also in the congressional district of Hon. H. M. TOWNER, with a population of about 1,000, reports that the village mail delivery has benefited the town; that the patrons prize the service very highly and would be dissatisfied to lose it; and that "the American people want this service whether it is self-sustaining or not, and the administration that seeks to limit or curtail this service will be held accountable when election day comes around."

St. John, Kans., is located in the congressional district represented by Hon. JOUETT SHOUSE, who has evidenced much interest in the village mail delivery service, and from information which he has secured from St. John it appears that the mail delivery has benefited the town, it being of importance to the civic and business welfare of the community, and that the people would be greatly dissatisfied were the delivery to be discontinued.

Carrollton, Ky., a town of about 3,500 people, is located in the congressional district of Hon. A. B. ROUSE. In a report from a prominent citizen of Carrollton, furnished through Congressman ROUSE, it appears that the mail delivery has helped to increase the receipts of the post office; that it is of importance and great benefit both to the civic and business welfare of the town, and that "it would be hard to reconcile the people if the free delivery would be taken from them."

Carlisle, Ky., is situated in the congressional district of Hon. W. J. FIELDS and has a population of about 1,500. It is reported that the village mail-delivery service has helped to increase the receipts of the post office at Carlisle at the rate of about from $600 to $1,000 annually; that the service has benefited the town and is of importance to both the civic and business welfare of the community; and that the patrons would protest against a proposition to discontinue the service.

Catlettsburg, Ky., is also represented by Hon. W. J. FIELDS, and the Congressman has reported that the mail-delivery service there "has proven satisfactory to a high degree."

Russellville, Ky., in the congressional district of Hon. R. Y. THOMAS, Jr., has a population of about 3,300. Mr. THOMAS has submitted a report on the mail delivery, obtained from a prominent citizen of Russellville, which states that the delivery has helped to increase the receipts of the post office; that it is of importance and benefit to both the civic and business welfare of the town; and "that the service should be maintained for the reason that it is beneficial to the city, the people, and the patrons of the office."

Mansfield, La., a town of about 1,600 people, is situated in the district of Hon. J. T. WATKINS. Through Judge WATKINS a report was received from Mr. W. T. Pegues regarding the delivery service at Mansfield, stating that it has helped to increase the receipts of the post office about 15 per cent; that it is of importance and great benefit to the civic and business welfare of the town; and that the patrons of the office would be very much opposed to the discontinuance of the service. The report further states that "the service here has been and is giving universal satisfaction, and I believe that same should be made permanent, as I do not think the people would be willing to be without it. They have grown to look upon it as as much of a necessity as the telephone, electric lights, etc."

Congressman WATKINS personally assures "that the people of Mansfield are more than pleased with the village free delivery of mail which they have and are anxious for its continuance."

Baldwinsville, Mass., is in the congressional district represented by Hon. CALVIN D. PAIGE. In a report furnished through the Congressman from Mr. C. A. Perley, a prominent resident of Baldwinsville, it is claimed that the village mail delivery has benefited the town; that it has been of importance to the civic and business welfare of the community, and the people are desirous to have the service continued.

Indian Orchard, Mass., is situated in the district represented by Hon. F. H. GILLETT and has a population of about 5,000. From Congressman GILLETT it has been learned that the mail delivery at Indian Orchard has helped to increase the receipts of the post office; that the delivery has benefited the town; that the people believe the service to be of importance to the civic and business welfare of the community; and that "most decidedly" they would not be satisfied to have the service discontinued, as such action would be considered "a serious interference with their convenience."

Durand, Mich., a town of approximately 3,000 people, is located in the congressional district of Hon. JOSEPH W. FORDNEY. A report on the mail delivery from Mr. T. H. Healy, a prominent citizen of Durand, shows that within a year since the establishment of the delivery service the receipts of the post office increased $800; the service has benefited the town, and the patrons of the office "most decidedly" would not be satisfied to have it discontinued. In further voicing the sentiment of the people of Durand, the report states: "We are proud of our home town, and the delivery is one of our best privileges. The people of Durand can be relied upon to do all in their power that the privilege be continued."

Reed City, Mich., is located in the district represented by Hon. GEORGE A. LOUD and has a population of about 1,500. Mr. A. M. FLEISHHAUER, a well-known citizen, reports, through Congressman LOUD, that the mail delivery has benefited the town and that the people believe the service to be of importance to the civic and business welfare of the community.

Ada, Minn., is in the district of Hon. HALVOR STEENERSON, who kindly secured a report from Mr. D. C. Jones, a business man, to the effect that the postal revenues had not increased, but that the mail delivery had benefited the town to some extent, and that the "unanimous wish of the people is to have it continued." He also stated that "it is a great convenience to the residence part of the town."

Edina, Mo., a town of about 1,800 people, in the district of Hon. JAMES T. LLOYD, who for many years has been interested in the extension of mail-delivery facilities, reports an increase of postal receipts, and Mr. P. C. Gibbons states that the town is benefited and that the people would certainly object to the discontinuance of the mail-delivery service. He further states, "I have not found one who is not very much in favor of the delivery service, and most of them would think it nothing short of a calamity to have the village mail-delivery service discontinued."

Festus, Mo., in the district of Hon. WALTER L. HENSLEY, reports that the postal receipts had increased, although a large factory had shut down a part of the time. Mr. A. H. Long, in a report to Congressman HENSLEY, stated that the business men are especially in favor of the continuance of the service; that the service had benefited the town; and that "the only complaint is that only a portion of the city gets the delivery and they would all like to have it."

Jackson, Mo. This town is in the district of Hon. J. J. RUSSELL, who obtained a report from Mr. J. E. Schmuke to the effect that the mail delivery had benefited the town and that "it would be a decided step backward" to discontinue the service.

Plattsburg, Mo. Hon. J. W. ALEXANDER secured a report from Mr. A. R. Alexander, of Plattsburgh, who says that the mail-delivery service has proven of importance to the business welfare of the town and is of especial benefit to persons living at a distance from the post office and to homes where men are employed all day and where the children are too small to send to the post office.

Savannah, Mo., is in the district of Hon. CHARLES F. BOOHER. Mr. BOOHER reports that the receipts at the Savannah office have materially increased since the establishment of mail-delivery service; that the town has benefited and that the people are unanimously in favor of the continuance of the service.

Lebanon, Mo., in the district of Congressman THOMAS L. RUBEY, is served by one carrier who delivers mail to 1,050 patrons. Congressman RUBEY resides in Lebanon, and when Congress was not in session last year he made considerable study of the village mail-delivery service. He reports that "the people are very much pleased with the service, both the business men and those who live in the resident portion of the city." Through the courtesy of the Congressman, Mr. S. H. Manchester has furnished statistics showing that a large amount of letters and newspapers are delivered by the mail carrier and that the service operates at a profit to the postal revenue.

Pierce, Nebr., located in the district of Hon. D. V. STEPHENS, reports that the mail delivery has been of benefit to the community; that the people want the service continued; and Mr. J. B. McDonald states that the people would be greatly inconvenienced if they did not have the village mail delivery, as the delivery "has proved a great success." A report from Mr. F. J. Rastede, of Pierce, says that a personal canvass of the patrons shows the popularity of the service. The county attorney, M. H. Leamy, says he has made a close study of the village delivery system, and that he is confident that it has met with the approval of the people generally.

Wymore, Nebr., is situated in the district of Hon. CHARLES H. SLOAN. Mayor McMullen says the people are unanimously of the belief that the civic and business welfare of the town has improved and that the people are in favor of the mail-delivery service.

Pleasantville, N. J., has about 4,000 people who are served by the village mail delivery. This town is in the congressional district of Hon. ISAAC BACHARACH, who has furnished a report from a prominent citizen which states that the receipts of the post office at Pleasantville have increased about 30 per cent since the establishment of village mail delivery; the town has undoubtedly benefited, and the patrons would "positively not" be satisfied to allow the Post Office Department to discontinue the service. The report further states that previous to the establishment of this delivery receipts for some unknown reason were falling off at the rate of $125 per month and more, but the establishment of this delivery evidently put a spirit of development and progress in the inhabitants of the city so that the conditions above were reversed.

Leonia, N. J., a town of about 2,000 people, in the district of Hon. A. C. HART, is represented by a report from Mr. W. H. Elcks, who says that the mail delivery has been a great incentive to building; that if discontinued it would be a serious setback, and that if necessary the whole town would sign a petition indorsing mail delivery.

Mayville, N. Y., a town of 1,100 people, is in the district of Hon. CHARLES M. HAMILTON. The Congressman secured a report from Mr. M. P. Whallon, who states that the people favor the service, and that it has been of benefit to the town.

Lancaster, N. Y., is a town of 4,500 people. Congressman CHARLES B. SMITH secured a report from Mr. John Soemann, who says that there has been only one person in the whole town who does not care for the mail delivery service, and that person has a store near the post office. The postal revenues of the office have increased, and the people would be decidedly opposed to any effort to discontinue the service and are emphatically impressed with its value to the business and civic welfare of the community. The service in Lancaster is described as "the best thing the Government ever did for Lancaster."

Painted Post, N. Y., a town of 1,300, in the district of Hon. HARRY H. PRATT, reports that the service has increased the good will of the public toward the post office, and that only a few residents living in the immediate vicinity of the office failed to avail themselves of the service. Since the town has the mail delivery, houses have been numbered and street signs erected. Much possible good from village mail service is lost, however, by the failure of the department to provide boxes in order to insure both the collection as well as the delivery of mail.

Newton, N. C., is in the district represented by Congressman E. Y. WEBB. In a communication addressed to Mr. WEBB by Mr. F. M. McWilliams, editor and proprietor of the Newton Enterprise, the village delivery service is described as being very popular. The people in that part of the town which is now served appreciate the convenience fully as much as the people in the country do the rural delivery. The only objection is that the service only partially covers the town. Extension of the service is greatly desired by the people, and notwithstanding the fact that the residents of the town are now required to pay the 2-cent rate on local and drop letters, none of the people would be in favor of abolishing the one route already established. All are anxious to have the service extended.

Enderlin, N. Dak., is located in the congressional district of Hon. H. T. HELGESEN. In a report submitted by the Congressman concerning the mail delivery, it is stated that the postal receipts have increased since the establishment of the service; all agree that it has benefited the town; the patrons would "not peacefully" submit to a proposition to discontinue the service, but would be very much disappointed. The report further states that there is no diversity of opinion as to the desirability of the service from the patrons' viewpoint, or as to the fact that this service has actually stimulated postal business and increased the revenues of the office.

Paulding, Ohio, a town of 2,500 people, is located in the district of Hon. N. E. MATTHEWS, who reports that the people are "most assuredly" interested in the continuance of the service, and that the public generally, and the business men in particular, would be greatly discommoded and disappointed if the service were not continued, as it is a "decided success and is greatly appreciated by the people."

Swanton, Ohio, a town of 1,100, in the district of Gen. ISAAC R. SHERWOOD, reports an increase in the postal receipts. As an evidence of the interest in the service, the town council passed an ordinance requiring the erection of street signs, the numbering of houses, and submitted a proposition for lighting the town. The people are reported as highly appreciative of the service.

Jeffersonville, Ohio, is located in the district of Hon. S. D. FESS. Mr. W. W. Williams reports a gradual increase in the postal receipts, and says that the mail delivery has been working perfectly; that everybody is satisfied with the service and would "raise an awful howl" if it were discontinued. He says that the service has been of a decided benefit for as progressive a town as Jeffersonville.

Dewey, Okla., is situated in the district of Hon. JAMES S. DAVENPORT. Congressman DAVENPORT secured a report from a number of business men, among them Mr. B. A. Everetts, Mr. L. V. Ford, and Mr. I. B. McCrary, who state that the service is giving satisfaction, that they would dislike to see it discontinued, and that "quite an addition has been made to the city limits" because the people wanted the service extended. Mr. William Powden advised Congressman DAVENPORT that he considered the village-delivery service a valuable adjunct to the Postal System, as it relieved the people in the towns of the hardship of being compelled to visit the post office for their mail daily. A similar strong indorsement was also furnished by Mr. B. B. Boylan, of the Security National Bank, of Dewey.

Edmond, Okla., a town of 1,500, in the district of Hon. J. B. THOMPSON, reports an increase in the postal receipts. The mail delivery is said to have benefited the town and met with the favor of the public.

Wynnewood, Okla., in the district of Hon. J. B. THOMPSON, a town of 1,200 people, reports an increase of the postal receipts, and Mr. George P. Ralloy states that the mail delivery "has proven quite popular and is very beneficial to both business houses and the residence portion of the city." He describes the service as indispensable, but urges that the department could make the service more efficient by supplying mail boxes.

Ephrata, Pa., is a town of about 3,500 people. The village delivery in Ephrata has been of undoubted success, and Dr. I. N. Lightner reports that the postal, public, and civic benefit has been great. The people are enthusiastic over the efficiency of the mail-delivery system, and quite recently two voluminous petitions signed by all patrons and declaring, among other things, the public approval of the service, were circulated and presented to the Post Office Department.

Palmerton, Pa., is represented by Hon. H. J. STEELE. It is a town of about 4,500 people, and the village mail delivery is described as having very much benefited the town. Mr. William H. Gruber says that the people would vigorously protest against the discontinuance of the service, as it would be a hardship to require the public to call at the post office, as heretofore, before the mail delivery was established, confusion existed because so many people were required to visit the post office and call at the general-delivery window for their mail.

Spring City, Pa., a town of 3,000 inhabitants, located in the district of Hon. THOMAS S. BUTLER, reports through Mr. C. G. Williams that the postal receipts have increased, that the town is benefited by the service, and that practically every person in the town would vigorously protest if the service should be discontinued. He says the people seem delighted with it, but that boxes should be erected on the street corners so that the mail could be properly collected by the carriers.

Tunkhannock, Pa., a town of 2,500 people, in the district of Hon. L. T. MCFADDEN, reports an increase in the postal revenues since the mail delivery was established, and it is said that the people have adjusted their work, mode of life, and habits with reference to the mail service, and that in various ways the civic and business welfare of the town has benefited. Mr. Edward B. Farr says that to discontinue the mail service would be like abolishing the public schools.

White Haven, Pa., a town of 1,500 people, in the district represented by Hon. JOHN J. CASEY, reports that the postal receipts have increased; that the town has benefited by the mail delivery; and that the people are interested in the service.

Freeland, Pa., is also in the district of Congressman JOHN J. CASEY, who reports that the people there are very much opposed to the discontinuance of the village-mail service.

Wrightsville, Pa.—Through Congressman C. WILLIAM BEALES I have been furnished with a large number of letters from prominent residents of Wrightsville who declare that the mail-delivery service in their town has been a success; it has become an absolute necessity, and that it would be a calamity if the Government were to discontinue the service. The business men vigorously protest against its discontinuance and declare with great enthusiasm that the service should be continued in Wrightsville and extended to all towns of similar size. This sentiment was indorsed by the chief burgess, R. P. Wilton, and by officials of the Wrightsville banks and by the leading business men of the town.

Minneapolis, Kans., is located in the district represented by Hon. GUY T. HELVERING. The Congressman has kept in close touch with the operation of the mail-delivery service at Minneapolis, and reports that in every way the service has proven to be a boon there, and that "with the slight amount of expense involved it seems we can ill afford to do away with a service which is so useful." He further states that the service is an unqualified success and to abolish it would be to work a hardship.

Pascoag, R. I., is in the district represented by Hon. AMBROSE KENNEDY, who reports that the mail delivery is regarded as very successful; 95 per cent of the population of Pascoag take advantage of the village delivery, and the patrons heartily favor the service and would protest vigorously if an attempt were made to discontinue it.

Belton, S. C., a town of about 1,600 people, is located in the district of Hon. WYATT AIKEN, who reports an increase in the postal receipts since the establishment of mail delivery; that the patrons consider this service to be one of the most popular branches of Postal Service, and that it is of importance to the civic and business welfare of the town.

Blackville, S. C., is represented by Hon. JAMES F. BYRNES. Mr. B. J. Hammel reports, through the Congressman, that the delivery has helped to increase the postal receipts and has benefited the town; the citizens have named the streets and numbered their houses, and it would create great dissatisfaction to discontinue the service.

Branchville, S. C., in the district of Hon. A. F. LEVER, has a population of about 1,200. Mr. P. Earl Dukes reports that the postal receipts have increased since mail delivery was inaugurated and that the town has benefited thereby. He further states that the service seems to be operating very satisfactorily and is of great convenience to all the people, and they are very anxious to have it continued.

Miller, S. Dak., is represented by Hon. R. C. JOHNSON. Mr. Harlan J. Bushfield reports an increase in the postal receipts, due to the mail delivery; that the service has benefited the town; that it has caused the extension of sidewalks, the erecting of street signs on all corners, and the numbering of houses; the people believe it should be continued by all means, and there certainly would be strong opposition to a proposition to discontinue the carrier service.

Lenoir City, Tenn., is in the district of Hon. R. W. AUSTIN. Mr. F. A. Weiss reports, through Congressman AUSTIN, that "there is no question whatever but that the delivery has been beneficial, of advantage, and certainly a convenience to patrons." It is further stated that the service is of importance to the civic and business welfare of the town; the "patrons of this office can not be served satisfactorily from one general delivery window; therefore the discontinuance of village delivery service would be an injustice."

McMinnville, Tenn., a town of about 1,700 people, is located in the district of Hon. JOHN A. MOON. In a report from a prominent citizen, submitted by the Congressman, it is claimed that the postal receipts are constantly increasing since the establishment of mail delivery; that the service is of importance to the civic and business welfare of the town; and there would be "tremendous dissatisfaction" with a proposition to discontinue the delivery.

Marion, Va., in the district of Hon. C. B. SLEMP, reports an increase in postal receipts due to mail delivery; that it has benefited the town; is of importance to the civic and business welfare of the community; that all the people are delighted with the service, and none would like to see it discontinued.

Kent, Wash., represented by Hon. W. E. HUMPHREY, has a population of approximately 2,000. Mr. B. A. Bowen reports that mail delivery has benefited the town; that it "most emphatically" is of importance to the civic and business welfare of the community; that the patrons "positively" would not be satisfied to have the delivery discontinued; and that it would be a step backward to discontinue it.

Princeton, W. Va., a town of approximately 1,500, represented by Hon. EDWARD COOPER, reports an increase in postal receipts; that the mail delivery has benefited the town and is of importance to the business and civic welfare of the community, and it would be a great inconvenience to the town to have the delivery service discontinued.

Evansville, Wis., is represented by Hon. HENRY ALLEN COOPER, who reports that he received a number of letters from patrons "strongly advising against the discontinuance of free delivery and urging that every effort be made to secure its retention in Evansville. Two patrons wrote that they would not object to the discontinuance, but others, in their letters, said that these two took this attitude because their places of business are located near the post office. Judging from the whole correspondence, I am clearly of the opinion that the large majority of the patrons of the office at Evansville desire that their free mail delivery service be not discontinued."

Dodgeville, Wis., a town of about 1,500 people, is in the district represented by Hon. JOHN M. NELSON. Mayor John A. Campbell reports an increase in postal receipts due to mail delivery; that the service has benefited the town; and the patrons would not be satisfied to have it discontinued.

New Lisbon, Wis., a town of about 1,100 people, is represented by Hon. J. J. ESCH, who has furnished a report indicating an increase in postal receipts due to mail delivery; that the service has benefited the town; and the people believe the delivery to be of importance to the civic and business welfare of the community.

Having introduced the bill which resulted in the establishment of this service in the Sixty-second Congress, I am greatly pleased, and I am sure that the Members of this body are likewise pleased, to realize the satisfaction caused by their official action in establishing this service and the benefits to all concerned that are accruing therefrom.

In order to show just what service has been established, it is desired to insert in the RECORD a list of the post offices at which the experimental village mail delivery system is now in operation. This tabulation shows the post offices at which the service has been established, grouped in States, the population, and the name of the Congressman in whose district the service has been located. I will feel well repaid for the labor connected with the preparation of this tabulation and the reports presented above if they shall prove to be interesting and valuable and shall encourage a proper and reasonable extension of postal facilities in the cities and towns of this country whose population, being less than 10,000, are not now eligible for city delivery.

The table shows that 134 Representatives have secured for their districts this exceedingly desirable service, and it also shows that there are as many more congressional districts embracing rural territory where this system has not been established, but where it is undoubtedly available to those Members of Congress who will demand it for towns that can comply with the rules of the department:

RAILWAY MAIL "REORGANIZATION."

The annual report of the Postmaster General contains a number of recommendations for legislation. Many of these recommendations are a renewal of those suggested by the department for several years past, and some of them should be at once enacted into law, so that good business practice should be applied to the administration of the service. Some recommendations are not, however, entitled to favorable consideration unless the policy of the postal officials shall warrant the confidence that administrative discretion will not be used to the detriment of the service and its employees.

In recent years it has become a fad to retrench in the Railway Mail Service, or take up the slack, as some have pleased to term it. This policy has had a far-reaching effect. It has reduced the efficiency of that important branch of the Postal Establishment. Large quantities of important mail which was expedited by being worked in the railway post-office cars is now shipped in storage and the distribution is made at terminal stations with a consequent delay in the delivery of such mail. In fact, it has been reported that the city distribution of mail has been greatly reduced on the cars, and many of the larger cities, such as Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, New York, and Chicago, have suffered serious results from changes which cause delay in the delivery of much business mail because it does not go out by carriers as promptly as it once did. While the changes save money to the Postal Department, they are costly to the business of the country, and, like the rural delivery changes, the final result is the loss of millions of dollars by the people.

The clerks of the Railway Mail Service have suffered much from these innovations. Injustice has been done scores of these men by transferring them to the terminal post offices, where they are removed from the line of advancement which Congress created in the classification act passed three years ago. In many cases men have been forced to accept transfers from the post-office car lines to the terminals and compelled to remove from their homes to the big cities, where the cost of living is greater and the opportunities for the men and their families less desirable. Although changing service conditions may at times necessitate such action, it is unfair to the employees to upset the established conditions under which these men contracted to give their services to the Government, unless the exigencies of the service demand such radical changes. The conditions did not warrant many of these changes, and it is evident that the changes have not increased the efficiency of the service.

One illustration with which I am personally familiar is that which exists on the great New York and Pittsburgh railway post-office line which traverses my congressional district and the States of Pennsylvania and New Jersey. By a series of changes, the end of which is not yet discernible, the number of men on this line has been decreased, the number of crews was reduced, and a schedule of runs arranged which on one trick of duty only allows a two-day lay off instead of six days for recuperation. The New York and Pittsburgh railway post office is one of the biggest in the country, operating over a thickly populated territory between the heaviest mail points—New York, Philadelphia, and Pittsburgh, with connections to Chicago and St. Louis—and these men work on the fastest trains in the country. Considering the mental and physical strain to which these men are subjected during a tour of duty, it is not humane to cut down one of their lay-off periods, as has been done, to two days. After a week of duty it takes two or three days to overcome the reaction, and the physical welfare of the clerks should be considered.

Unless the Post Office Department voluntarily takes action to modify the policy now in effect it is the duty of Congress to enact a law which shall put a limitation upon the mileage or hours of service of these railway postal clerks and thereby insure for them the relief which the spirit of humanity and justice demands.

"REORGANIZATION" OF THE RURAL MAIL.

The rural-mail delivery has been "reorganized" in the name of "economy" from Maine to California and the protests of the people are heard from sea to sea and from the Gulf to the Great Lakes. Charges of decreased efficiency are everywhere. There can be no honest denial of the fact that the burdens of the rural letter carriers have been unduly increased. Congress wanted these men to have fair treatment, both in compensation and mileage, but the hardships imposed by the reorganizers make rural-carrier positions undesirable in wet or wintry weather. The treatment of these men can not be justified. The farmers and other rural residents have protested vigorously against the new fads and theories applied to the administration of the rural delivery, and the farmers themselves declare that the "reorganization" has cost them millions of dollars. In this connection it is desired to place in the RECORD a newspaper article, reporting the official action of the Pennsylvania Grangers' Association, which claims that in Pennsylvania the so-called reorganization of rural-mail routes has cost the grangers $8,000,000 and greatly added to the inconvenience of farm life.

AUTO RURAL ROUTES HAVE COST FARMERS $8,000,000—STATE GRANGE PROTESTS AGAINST THE INNOVATION—DECLARE STRETCHING OF ROUTES FROM 20 TO 50 MILES HAS WORKED TO DETRIMENT OF BOTH THE CARRIER AND PATRON.

STATE COLLEGE, PA., December 23.

Lengthening the rural-mail routes in this State has cost the grangers $8,000,000 and greatly added to the inconvenience of farm life, according to two resolutions offered to-day at the annual session of the Pennsylvania State Grange, at State College. It was declared that the Federal Post Office Department stretched 20-mile routes to 50-mile routes, to the detriment of both carrier and patrons. The grangers want the routes shortened so that the rural citizen can be served with mail as he was before the readjustment.

The chief complaint came from the master of Oxford Grange, of Chester County, and his grievance was supported by R. S. Rankin, master of the Pomona Grange, of Washington County.

Members of Congress representing rural districts are so well informed concerning the injury which has been done both the farmers and rural carriers within recent months by this indefensible "reorganization" scheme that it is unnecessary for me to comment upon this subject to great extent. Every man experienced in rural life will appreciate the difficulties to be encountered by the operation of a route 30 or more miles in length on 313 days of the year. Of course, under favorable conditions and in sections of the country where climatic conditions are not severe the mileage can be accomplished by horses or by automobiles over hard-surfaced roads on the 30 to 60 mile routes, but in winter and spring months it is expecting too much of the rural carriers in the North and West. As a consequence the patrons of these routes must suffer inconveniences and submit to decreased efficiency of service.

That there has been serious impairment of the efficiency of the service by the "reorganization" plans of the department is not doubted by the Post Office Committee, which was convinced of the fact by personal knowledge of its own membership and by the testimony of Members of Congress who appeared before the committee. The Post Office Committee therefore refused almost unanimously to accede to the recommendation of the department that authority be extended to it in the form of permanent law to continue the schemes of reorganization that have wrought havoc with the Rural Service. So far as it could by appropriation of funds the Post Office Committee, with practical unanimity, rebuked the false economy which has resulted in the impairment and disorganization of the Rural Delivery Service by replacing in the bill the four and one-half million dollars—a so-called saving caused by curtailment of the service and by discommoding the patrons thereof—thus appropriating for the year 1917 for the Rural Delivery Service $53,000,000, an amount identical with that appropriated for 1916.

I do not doubt that this committee and the House will sustain the action of the Post Office Committee.

ONE-CENT RATE FOR LOCAL LETTERS.

In recent years there has been a growing demand for legislation reducing the letter postage rate because of the fact that more than $70,000,000 profit is derived from this class of business. The public desire for some modification of the rate is increasingly insistent, and the RECORDS of the past few weeks record the introduction in both the House and Senate of a large number of bills proposing a 1-cent drop-letter postage law.

During the Sixty-first Congress I presented what I believe was the first bill to reduce the rate on local or drop letters to 1 cent per ounce or fraction thereof, including delivery at letter-carrier offices where the system of free delivery is established. This bill was reintroduced in the Sixty-second, Sixty-third, and Sixty-fourth Congresses, and I have been the recipient of hundreds of letters from all parts of the United States favoring the legislation by reason of its manifest merit.

The bill proposed reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon all mail matter of the first class postage shall be charged at the rate of 2 cents per ounce or fraction thereof on a letter weighing 1 ounce or less, and for each additional ounce or fraction thereof there shall be charged 1 cent. On drop or local letters postage shall be charged at the rate of 1 cent per ounce or fraction thereof, including delivery at letter-carrier offices where the system of free delivery is established.

The RECORD of August 21, 1912, contains my views in full on the letter-postage question, and includes excerpts from the official figures proving the arguments advanced.

I am not prepared to espouse the feasibility of a flat rate of 1 cent for all letters, but I do favor an immediate return to the people of a reasonable share of the exorbitant profit on first-class mail.

The cost of handling local letters on an average in a city or town having letter-carrier service will figure less than one-sixth of a cent, for which service 2 cents is now charged. The profit on this mail is several hundred per cent. There can be no sound argument against granting a local delivery 1-cent rate on letters. The loss in revenue will be immaterial, owing to the increase in postal business which will be stimulated, as is invariably the case, by a reduced rate. The people are entitled to the reduction. Congress should at this session grant the request.

Prior to 1845 the letter rate was based on the number of pieces or sheets of paper, and March 3, 1845, Congress declared weight as a standard, fixing one-half ounce as the basis. In those days length of haul and zone limits were also considered when making postage charges. The rate on letters was reduced to 5 cents for each half ounce or fraction thereof; then to 3 cents, and finally to 2 cents. Congress, in 1872, recognized a further distinction and authorized a 1-cent rate on drop or local letters at post offices where the system of free delivery is not established, and by the act of March 3, 1885, approved of a rate of 2 cents for each ounce or fraction thereof instead of "for each half ounce."

All of this legislation was enacted to "facilitate letter correspondence," and to reduce the rate of postage. The history of these enactments shows that great increase in the business and postal revenues resulted. The Postal Service is not a money-making institution, and when any feature of the service earns an exhorbitant profit of several hundred per cent there should be an adjustment so that the public can share in the earnings.

We also have a 1-cent rate on postal cards, delivered anywhere in the United States, and these the Government provides at its own expense. The law authorizing the present postal card directs that the Postmaster General shall not only furnish the cards of "good, stiff paper," but shall print them, and transmit the postal cards through the mails at a charge of 1 cent each, including the cost of manufacture. That the people have appreciated this facility and postage reduction is evident, for they purchase 2,000,000,000 of these postal cards annually, and in addition to the Government postal cards many millions of private cards are also sent through the mails upon which the 1-cent first-class rate is paid.

From seven million to nine million dollars are annually paid to the Government for postal cards, and the Post Office Department is put at an annual expense of from one hundred and seventy to one hundred and ninety thousand dollars for the paper and printing of these cards, plus many thousands of dollars for shipping the cards to the various post offices in addition to the cost of selling them. These facts demonstrate that the United States Postal Service now has a 1-cent postage rate which could be extended very readily to the great benefit of the people and not to the injury of the Government.

Under the existing law, in a town which does not have carrier service, local letters go into the post office with a 1-cent stamp affixed. The moment that town is allowed the boon of free delivery it is penalized by the substitution of a 2-cent rate on local or drop letters, notwithstanding the fact that the actual cost to the Government is less than one-sixth of a cent, and the other inconsistent fact that post cards, the cost of which is borne by the Government, are delivered at the 1-cent rate.

So that, Mr. Chairman, in view of the exorbitant profits which now accrue to the Government on local or drop letters, the popular clamor throughout the country for a flat reduction in the first-class rate, I am deeply impressed with the belief that the safe and sane thing for the Congress to do is to approach this matter gradually and satisfy public sentiment and the demands of justice by adopting a 1-cent rate on local or drop letters, thereby reserving the great bulk of the profits on first-class mail until Congress in its wisdom shall grant further concessions.

FRANKING PRIVILEGE SHOULD BE CURTAILED.

Mr. Chairman, it is hoped that Congress will not agree to a further extension of the privilege of free mail distribution; but, on the other hand, it would be advisable to in some way curtail the franking privilege granted by present laws. I fully realize the necessity of allowing a reasonable freedom to Senators and Members of the franking privilege, and, after giving the subject some thought, I introduced in the last Congress, and have reintroduced, the following bill:

Be it enacted, etc., That the use of the franking privilege shall be limited to the mailing of official correspondence not exceeding 4 ounces in weight and to the distribution of copies of such speeches and documents as are printed by order of Congress.

This bill authorizes the use of the frank for mailing official correspondence not exceeding 4 ounces in weight and the distribution of copies of such speeches and documents as are printed by order of Congress, and I hope some such legislation can soon be enacted into law.

THE PARCEL POST.

The necessity for better business methods are clear, and the present operation of the Parcel Post Service proves the contention.

The Parcel Post Service has been conducted as a cut-rate business instead of being operated upon a basis of reasonable competition, as was intended by the people when public sentiment approved the enactment of the parcel-post law as a means of providing for the transportation of packages by mail at rates which would offset the express combination. The Parcel Post Service is greatly appreciated by the public, but the people never intended that it should be so managed as to become an expense to the Government.

Last October the Postmaster General had a count made of the parcel-post business, and it indicated revenues of about $3,200,000 a month. The annual report fails to disclose just how much was lost by the department, but it is evident that this immensely popular and growing service is not self-supporting and has not been conducted with such efficiency and economy as to produce that profit which had been anticipated. The Postmaster General says:

The usefulness and success of the parcel post depends to a large extent on the maintenance of such postage rates and conditions of mailability as will make it self-supporting.

He could have proceeded further and admitted that the present administration had not maintained the parcel-post rates authorized by Congress, but had altered the first-zone rate and given the mail-order houses a rate which gained little for the public, but has cost the Government in excess of $10,000,000 a year. He should also have admitted that the rural mail carriers have been required to assume greater burdens by carrying more mail and traveling longer routes without being given that full consideration which Congress voted. He could have told how the star-route contractors were bound under their unyielding contracts to transport great loads of freight as parcels, and how scores of northern and western star-route contractors lost their money because of the Government's power to do as it pleased. The poor mail messengers likewise have paid the penalties of the parcel-post increase, and the railroads were required to carry tons of packages without compensation until the Government at its pleasure saw fit to make an adjustment.

BUSINESS MANAGEMENT OF THE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. Chairman, it is inconceivable to the practical business men of this country that an institution with revenues exceeding $300,000,000 should be conducted with great loss. The people have never declared that the Postal Service shall be a profit-making concern, and it is generally understood that certain features of the postal establishment have for years been conducted at a loss. It is recognized that postage rates authorized by Congress many years ago are inconsistent with the revenues and expenses of certain classes of the service.

The first and second class postage rates have been firmly established for many years, and the one class is largely associated with the other. In this case the great profit on first-class matter has more than offset the loss on second-class matter. No doubt last year a profit of $75,000,000 was made on first-class mail and a loss of fully $40,000,000 was incurred on second-class mail matter. Doubtless the rates for registry and special delivery are about right and produce a fair profit on the business handled. We know that the Rural Mail Service costs more than the revenue derived from this service, as does the second-class business; but the indirect benefit to the masses of the people has for years produced public sentiment which justifies the continuance of the expenditures. In the case of the Rural Mail Service the money expended by the Government has done much to make farm life pleasant, but the greatest benefit has come from the general advancement of agriculture. With good administration and proper regulation, the losses can be overcome without the necessity of decreasing the established rural service or without increasing the postage rates on second-class mail matter.

What the American Postal Service needs to-day is business management. What corporation with revenues of $300,000,000 a year would submit a business of such great proportions to the general management of one man? There is necessity for better directorship, and the business policy should be under the direction of a group of capable men of both business and postal experience, who would manage the Post Office Department as any large business institution should be conducted. There would be no serious objection to the continuance of the Postmaster General as the political head of the department and a member of the President's Cabinet to carry into effect the wishes of the people, but we should have experts and strong men in charge of the actual operation of the service continuously.

I thank the Members for their indulgence and attention.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, how much time has the gentleman used?

The CHAIRMAN. He used 34 minutes, and yields back 1 minute.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, no committee of this House performs a more important or a more difficult service than the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and no committee of this House has performed such a difficult service with more signal fidelity and success than the present Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The Post Office Department is the greatest business institution of the Government—the greatest business institution of any Government. Its total receipts are over $300,000,000. I am not one of those who believe that the Post Office Department should be run at a profit. I am not even sure that it should be run always without a deficit. I do believe that it ought to be run as nearly on a business basis as it is possible to run it.

The introduction of a new element into the Post Office Service is now causing, and will in the immediate future cause, a tremendous rearrangement of the postal business. As long as the business of the Postal Department was confined almost entirely to the carriage of intelligence, it is impossible to weigh the results or the advantage to the people as against the cost of the service; but when we come to extend the Postal Service to the carriage of merchandise as distinguished from intelligence, we have introduced an element which all of us agree ought to pay its own way. The Government ought not to carry merchandise for anybody at a loss. On the other hand, there is a strong political and social reason why the carriage of intelligence into the home and business place of every citizen of the United States should be accomplished regardless of the initial or individual cost of that service.

From listening to these speeches that have been made this afternoon I understand how easy it is to cast criticisms upon a great business institution. I will undertake to say that no public-service corporation now exists or ever has existed in the United States that these shrewd gentlemen could not have arraigned with greater success and in more particulars than they have arraigned the great public-service system of the United States—the Post Office Department. Yet, apparently actuated by partisan motives, they busy themselves to stir up discontent among the employees of the service and the patrons of the post office, and magnify, in all cases, the conditions that affect their convenience or their interest adversely, and gloss over or forget to mention or deny the great extensions of the business that are for the benefit of the people.

A few minutes ago a Member from the great State of Massachusetts, which is gridironed with rural routes and filled with city service, and which radiates railway mail routes, was busy in putting into the RECORD individual complaints received because of changes in the rural routes, and yet that gentleman did not know that 167 extensions of the rural free delivery had been made in the State of Massachusetts in the single year preceding. That is a fair sample of the character of these criticisms.

No man will deny that changes are made at some inconvenience to established customs. No man will deny that the growth of every business demands readjustment and reestablishment; but apparently no one has seen fit to call attention to the fact that not only has that service been greatly extended in the last year, but that there are still great opportunities for an exension of the service and a business administration of it.

The reports of the hearings of this committee show that on the rural free delivery, which is, I think, one of the greatest and most beneficial features of the postal service, there are 4,320 routes in the United States where the carrier works less than four hours a day. I will undertake to say that there is not a public-service corporation that ever existed that would not correct that condition if it could. I do not hesitate to say that the great majority of business men and taxpayers and post-office patrons in this country would correct it in their own lines of business. Think of it! Four thousand three hundred and twenty routes in this country where the carrier works less than four hours a day!

Now, of course, it is the desire of the Postal Service to reach as many persons as possible, and to extend, with the facilities at hand, the benefits of rural delivery and the carriage of the mail to all citizens who can be reached, and not to confine these benefits to a few who happen to possess them now, to the exclusion of those who might possess them. Yet men who will argue for the static condition, and for archaic conditions in the postal service, are arguing against the businesslike extension of the facilities of the office. If more people can be served out of the pay roll provided by the taxpayers of the people, that ought to be done, and any honest man in charge of the service would do it if he could. In undertaking to do it he would doubtless make some mistakes, and doubtless he would see some places where from experience he would correct the arrangement that he had made. Doubtless he would see that the new arrangement had made some inconveniences, incidentally, and some advantages, incidentally; but he would attempt, as has been done, to extend the service to all homes and to all businesses to which it could be extended.

You have to deal not only with the question of the time taken to cover these routes, but the length of each route and the amount of mail matter carried. Yet, it has been the custom in the past arbitrarily to limit these routes upon the mileage carried, regardless of the difficulties, regardless of the time, regardless of the quantity of matter carried. Would any public-service corporation engage in that method of managing its business? Would it not take into consideration the difficulties, the time necessary for one carrier to cover his route, and the amount of the packages that he must deliver? When you come to consider that now you are dealing with the carriage of merchandise as well as of intelligence, you find that you are confronted with the absolute, imperative necessity that these things be taken into consideration. If you were carrying intelligence only, you would carry it regardless of expense to every man in the land. When you are combining the carriage of intelligence and merchandise in a great public-service enterprise, you must deal with it on the basis of the weight and tonnage of merchandise carried, the difficulty and the time consumed in carrying it, as well as the route upon which it is carried. To do otherwise is to discriminate between carriers receiving the same pay as well as to waste the taxpayers money by not securing a dollar's worth of service for a dollar of expenditure.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, if I had the time I would be glad to, but I do not believe I will have the time. The Postal Service is the great golden chain that links this country together. It is the one thing that makes this Nation a homogeneous whole. It is the one thing that has made a common language, a common literature, and common political ideals extend over 3,000 miles of territory. There is not a similar extent of territory in the known world where one man from one part of the country holds the same ideals, the same standard, social and intellectual development as the men in every other part of the country. Some of the smaller countries in the world contain a heterogeneous mass of different races and languages, different laws, and different customs; but here, bound together by the golden chain of the Postal Service, running into every nook and corner of the country, into every hill farm as well as to every center of population, we are knit into a indissoluble union, a union that will never be broken. The business of the Post Office Department is the great underlying feature of national unity in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MCARTHUR].

Mr. MCARTHUR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, in view of the nation-wide interest in the question of 1-cent postage for local or "drop" letters, I desire to occupy the time allotted to me by a discussion of this subject, as I believe it to be of more than ordinary concern to the people of our country. Early in the session, at the request of some of the leading business men in the district which I have the honor to represent, I introduced a bill providing for a reduction in the existing rate on this class of mail matter from 2 cents to 1 cent. I had already given the subject no little study and consideration, and thoroughly believed in the correctness of the measure which I introduced; and after hearing the question ably discussed and presented by the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BRITT] and others at a hearing before a subcommittee of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, I am more firmly convinced than ever of the wisdom and practicability of such legislation.

PRESENT RATE IS UNFAIR.

At the present time the 2-cent letter rate applies to all sealed letters, whether addressed to a neighbor in the next block or going from Maine to Oregon or Texas to Minnesota. The 2-cent rate for these long-distance letters a little more than covers the average cost of their transportation and delivery, but the Government realizes an immense profit upon local letters designed for delivery in the city or town where they are mailed. The cost of delivering the average local letter is less than a quarter of a cent, so the Government derives a profit of more than 1¾ cents on the average letter of this character. The local letter is handled by a collector, a city clerk, and a city carrier. The long-distance letter involves the same expense and, in addition thereto, it must be sorted by railway mail clerks on the trains, must be hauled from the post office to the train and from the train to the post office, and we must pay the railroad company for the transportation as well. It is manifestly unfair to persons or firms who wish to use the mails for the delivery of local letters to charge them the same rate as is charged for transporting letters and delivering them in places three or four thousand miles distant, and the time has arrived for a readjustment of rates.

BUSINESS CONCERNS NOW DELIVER THEIR OWN MAIL.

At the present time many merchants and manufacturers having a large local mail find it cheaper to deliver this mail by their own carriers than to pay the exorbitant governmental rate of 2 cents per letter. When the local postage rate for sealed letters is reduced to 1 cent practically all of this business will be handled by the Government, and, inasmuch as the average cost of handling such letters is less than a quarter of a cent, the Government will realize an immense profit, largely because of the increased volume of business. It is true more clerical aid and more carriers will be required, but even after figuring these added expenses the Government will realize large profits on this class of mail.

MEANS GREATER VOLUME OF BUSINESS.

One-cent local letter postage will mean a greater volume of business, more direct methods of advertising, cheaper and closer communication between the business man and his customer, the lawyer and his client, the doctor and his patient, the minister and his congregation, the lodge and its members, and the farmer (on the rural free-delivery route) and the conveniences of his town or trading center; in brief, it will develop written communication between all classes and conditions of people, poor and rich alike. There is no sound argument against this proposed 1-cent local postage rate, and no reason why it should not be established as soon as the revenues of the department can be adjusted to meet new conditions.

REVENUE SHORTAGE WOULD BE TEMPORARY.

It is undoubtedly true that the adoption of a 1-cent letter rate for local delivery would decrease the total receipts of the department for a brief time, but it is reasonably certain that the volume of local business would soon increase to such proportions that the total receipts would be even larger than at present. The proposed reduction in the postage rate would not mean a 50 per cent reduction in the revenue derived from local mail, for the reason that there are now used annually $20,000,000 worth of 1-cent postal cards, a large proportion of which are delivered where they are mailed, and for the additional reason that a 1-cent letter rate already exists in towns and villages that have no free-delivery service.

Experience has demonstrated that a reduction in postage eventually means a greater income for the department. The act of March 3, 1883 (22 Stat. L., 455), reduced general letter postage from 3 cents to 2 cents. When this act became operative, there was a sudden falling off in the receipts from the sale of postage stamps, but the general readjustment came rapidly and within a very few years there was a great increase over the total amount received during the most prosperous years of the 3-cent rate. In fact, the receipts from the sale of stamps doubled, trebled, and quadrupled in an astonishingly short space of time. The annual reports of the Postmaster General and the evidence given before the subcommittee on Post Offices and Post Roads will confirm these statements.

SECOND-CLASS MATTER CALLS FOR LARGE EXPENDITURES.

What accounts for the large expenditures of the department? It is the large volume of second-class printed matter which goes through the mails at the rate of 1 cent per pound. During the last fiscal year, according to the latest report of the Postmaster General, the Post Office Department handled 1,109,285,785 pounds of newspapers and periodicals, and after deducting the large volume of this printed matter that is delivered free within the limits of the county where it is published it will be seen that the receipts to the department on account of transporting newspapers and periodicals were less than $10,000,000. It is estimated that it cost the Government over $75,000,000 to deliver these newspapers and periodicals. To make up the loss thus incurred, first-class or letter mail, which weighed only one-fifth as much as the newspapers and periodicals, supplied nearly $200,000,000 worth of revenue and cost the Government less than $100,000,000. The chief source of this great amount of profit was derived from the delivery of local letters. Is it fair to require these persons or firms mailing these letters to make up the large deficit caused by the handling of newspapers and periodicals? It appears to me to be an unequal distribution of expense and an unusual privilege enjoyed by the few at the expense of the many.

NO OBJECTION TO LEGITIMATE PUBLICATIONS.

I am not here to make war on legitimate newspapers or periodicals. On the contrary, I believe in the widest possible circulation of these publications for the purpose of disseminating information and knowledge among the people—an educational force essential to the well being of democracy. The time has come, however, when there should be a readjustment of rates upon publications which are devoted almost exclusively to advertising. I do not favor increasing the rates on legitimate newspapers or periodicals that confine their advertising to a reasonable percentage of their total space. Practically all of such newspapers and magazines fill a genuine public demand, but there are countless numbers of fraudulent papers and magazines, "fly-by-night" campaign organs, cheap advertising mediums, and swindling devices of one kind and another which are not entitled to the Government rate of 1 cent per pound and which should be denied that privilege. The last report of the Postmaster General deals with this question, on pages 35 to 37. Speaking of these fraudulent publications and their methods, the Postmaster General says:

> These practices constitute a flagrant use of the second-class mail privilege, not only serving to swell the amount of this class, but at the same time subjecting publishers who conduct their business in harmony with both the letter and spirit of the law, to unfair competition.

POSTAL CLERKS AND CARRIERS OVERWORKED.

The public is sick and tired of these fraudulent and wholly unnecessary publications, and the patient postal clerks and carriers are growing weary under their ever-increasing burdens. With the elimination of the fraudulent second-class matter that I have referred to these clerks and carriers could handle an increased number of local letters which would be less burdensome, more of a service to the people, and greater revenue producers. There must be a general readjustment of things and in that readjustment we must reduce the burden of the second-class matter and lower the postage rate on local letters. More clerks and carriers will be required, but the finances of the department must be arranged to that end.

IS NOT A PARTISAN QUESTION.

This is in no sense a partisan matter. It is a matter of business, nothing more nor less. The Postal System was established and is maintained for service, not for revenue. A 2-cent rate on local letters impairs the service by forcing many business men to send private employees to deliver their letters on routes covered by mail carriers. It impairs the service by shutting out a considerable quantity of mail that would be sent if the local rate were cut in half. It discourages instead of developing the use of the mails. No man attempts to defend the present local postage rate as either scientific or equitable. No man defends it upon any ground other than that the Post Office Department needs the money, an argument that has little force as against the plea that the American people need the service at a reasonable cost, and the further practical certainty that the revenues would be diminished very slightly, if any; only temporarily, if at all; and eventually would be greatly increased. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RAINEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10484, the Post Office appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resignation from committees:

Hon. CHAMP CLARK, Speaker.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I beg to hand you herewith my resignation as a member of the Committee on Elections No. 2 and the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, to take effect immediately.

Sincerely and obediently, yours,

J. R. WALKER,
Eleventh District, Georgia.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the resignation is accepted.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. MONTAGUE, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

THE BEEF TRUST.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the investigation of the alleged Beef Trust.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Beef Trust. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman the character of the extension?

Mr. BORLAND. It will be some remarks accompanied by resolutions of the Missouri Cattle, Swine, and Beef Raisers' Association.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 9213. An act to authorize the Gary Land Co. to construct a bridge across the Grand Calumet River, in the State of Indiana.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 15, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Navy submitting a supplemental and additional estimate of appropriation required by the Naval Establishment during the fiscal year ending June 20, 1917 (H. Doc. No. 686); to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of War transmitting report of commission of Army officers appointed by the Secretary of War to investigate and report upon advisability of the acquirement by the United States Government of land near the Bay of San Diego, Cal., and elsewhere on the Pacific, Gulf, and Atlantic coasts for an aviation school and training grounds of the Signal Corps of the United States Army (H. Doc. No. 687); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of War transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, with a statement prepared from data received from officers in charge of the different engineering districts showing name, time employed, and compensation of civilian engineers employed between July 1, 1914, and June 30, 1915 (H. Doc. No. 688); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting draft of legislation to repeal certain provisions of the act approved March 3, 1915, making appropriation for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and statement relating thereto (H. Doc. No. 689); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury submitting an amendment to the act of October 22, 1914, relative to taxation on original issue of certificates of stock in corporations (H. Doc. No. 690); to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.

6. A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting letter from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, submitting a list of claims against the United States which have been adjusted and settled by the Chief of Engineers and approved by the Secretary of War (H. Doc. No. 691); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. BURNETT, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10487) reserving or excepting all ores or minerals on the lands, with the right of mining the same, on the site of the proposed post-office building at Calumet, Mich., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 185), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5185) for the relief of George H. Hammond, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 186), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2638) for the relief of Austin G. Tainter, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 187), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 15, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, the manifold ministries of Thy grace come to us continually, and crowd upon us with every ministry of a new day. All life and light, all social joy, all invitation to service, all aspirations high and holy, come from Thee. We come to Thee not only as the Author of our gifts and blessings but the Center of our life, and would learn to live our life in Thee. Speak Thou through us as instruments in Thy hand, that Thy great kingdom may be established and Thy will be done on earth. Guide us this day in the duties that are upon us. Forgive our sins. For Jesus' sake. Amen.

CHARLES A. CULBERSON, a Senator from the State of Texas, appeared in his seat to-day.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Cleveland, Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation to grant pensions to widows and orphans of veterans of the Spanish-American War, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of Local Grange No. 1934, Patrons of Husbandry, of Flushing, Ohio, remonstrating against an increase in armaments, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Union Distilling Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the laws relative to the shipment of alcohol from a distilling plant to a central denaturing warehouse, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. OLIVER presented memorials of sundry local unions of the International Union of the United Brewery Workmen in the State of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of the City Council of York; of the Federation of Trade Unions of York; and of Local Branch No. 960, National Association of Letter Carriers, of Carnegie, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for extended leave of absence to superannuated employees in the Postal Service, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 25, American Federation of Labor, of Rochester, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a petition of General J. P. S. Gobin Camp, No. 41, United Spanish War Veterans, of Scranton, Pa., and a petition of the Board of Trade of Mount Lebanon, Pa., praying for an increase of armaments, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. NELSON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Minnesota, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry employees of the Bureau of Animal Industry, Austin, Minn., praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate the salaries of different classes of veterinary inspectors and employees in the Bureau of Animal Industry, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented a petition of the Washington Volunteers' Association, of Seattle, Wash., praying for an increase in armaments, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WEEKS presented a resolution adopted by the Methodist Preachers' Meeting, of Boston, Mass., favoring national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the First Congregational Church of Rockland, Mass., praying for Federal censorship of motion pictures, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the Equal Suffrage League of Brockton, Mass., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution granting the right of suffrage to women, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MYERS. I present resolutions adopted at a meeting of the Associated Students of the University of Montana, held January 20, 1916, favoring an adequate appropriation for the Flathead reclamation project in Montana. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD, together with the signatures, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At a meeting of the Associated Students of the University of Montana held January 20, 1916, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Whereas the Flathead reclamation project in western Montana is of vast importance to all the people of the State, and the completion of this irrigation system has been seriously delayed by lack of funds to the extent that many settlers, who entered upon Flathead lands in good faith and in the belief that irrigation water would be furnished three years ago, have been absolutely ruined and other settlers are facing the loss of everything they possess: Be it

"Resolved, That the Associated Students of the University of Montana urge the Representatives of their State in Congress to use all means to secure the appropriation of $1,000,000 by Congress for the rapid prosecution of the construction of the Flathead reclamation project, to the end that the suffering of settlers may be relieved and that the implied promise of the Government may be fulfilled; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to Hon. HENRY L. MYERS, Hon. T. J. WALSH, Hon. JOHN M. EVANS, and Hon. TOM STOUT; that a copy be furnished to the editor of the Kaimin and one to Mr. James Harbert, of Polson, whose efforts in support of the reclamation project command our hearty respect and admiration.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine (for Mr. SHIVELY), from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10037) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 145) thereon.

Mr. CLAPP, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 140) for the relief of the estate of Israel Folsom, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 146) thereon.

Mr. LIPPITT, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 1416) to amend section 4215 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 147) thereon.

Mr. ASHURST, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2500) authorizing the adjustment of rights of settlers on the Moqui and Navajo Indian Reservations, in the State of Arizona, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 148) thereon.

Mr. POMERENE, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 19) relating to bills of lading in interstate and foreign commerce, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 149) thereon.

REFUND OF EXCESS DUTIES ON STEEL BLOOMS.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask unanimous consent to recall from the Committee on Claims a bill which I introduced a few days ago. It is Senate bill 4398, for the refund of excess duties on steel blooms. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be recalled from the Committee on Claims and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance. We are dealing with such bills all the time in that committee, and I think the bill should have gone there when introduced.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RURAL CREDITS.

Mr. HOLLIS. On behalf of the Committee on Banking and Currency I report back the so-called rural credits bill, the bill (S. 2986) to provide capital for agricultural development, to create a standard form of investment based upon farm mortgages, to equalize rates of interest upon farm loans, to furnish a market for United States bonds, to create Government depositaries and financial agents for the United States, and for other purposes, with a favorable report (No. 144). I ask unanimous consent that the report with the bill may be printed to the extent that the law permits—the usual number, and I give notice that at the conclusion of the unfinished business I shall move to take this bill from the calendar for immediate action.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill and report will be printed, and the bill will be placed on the calendar.

COINAGE OF A M'KINLEY SOUVENIR GOLD DOLLAR.

Mr. POMERENE. From the Committee on Banking and Currency I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 2) for the coinage of a McKinley souvenir gold dollar in commemoration of the erection of a memorial to William McKinley, late President of the United States. I call the attention of my colleague to this report.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for the immediate consideration of this bill. If the Senate will allow me, I will state very briefly the object.

There is being erected at the birthplace of the late William McKinley, at Niles, Ohio, a great memorial to him, and the memorial association has asked the assistance of the Government to the extent only of coining 100,000 souvenir gold dollars, absolutely without expense to the Government. Even the dies are furnished by the McKinley Memorial Association. The object is to sell the 100,000 souvenir gold dollars at a premium and apply the premium thus obtained to a fund for the furnishing and the maintenance of the memorial.

The bill was favorably reported by the House committee and passed the House without a dissenting vote, and I am sure there will be none in the Senate. I should like to have the immediate consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of aiding in defraying the cost of completing in a suitable manner the work of erecting a memorial in the city of Niles, Ohio, to William McKinley, late President of the United States of America, the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and is hereby, authorized to purchase in the market so much gold bullion as may be necessary for the purpose herein provided for, from which there shall be coined at the United States Mint, Philadelphia, standard gold dollars of the legal weight and fineness, to the number of not exceeding 100,000 pieces, to be known as the McKinley souvenir dollar, struck in commemoration of the erection of a memorial to William McKinley, late President of the United States of America, in the city of Niles, Ohio, his birthplace, the devices and designs upon which coins shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury; and all provisions of law relative to the coinage and legal-tender quality of the standard gold dollar shall be applicable to the coins issued under this act, and when so coined said souvenir dollars shall be delivered, in suitable parcels, at par, and without cost to the United States, to the National McKinley Birthplace Memorial Association and the dies shall be destroyed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURTS IN IOWA.

Mr. OVERMAN. On behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 73) to amend chapter 231, known as the Judicial Code, act of March 3, 1911 (vol. 36, U. S. Stat. L., sec. 81, p. 1111). I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] to it.

Mr. KENYON. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of this bill. It merely fixes the time of holding the Federal courts in Iowa. It is quite important that it shall be passed at once.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BRYAN. What is the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa states that it is a bill fixing the time and place of holding Federal courts in the State of Iowa.

Mr. BRYAN. All right.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. UNDERWOOD:

A bill (S. 4476) to amend an act to authorize the Dauphin Island Railway & Harbor Co., its successors or assigns, to construct and maintain a bridge or bridges or viaducts across the water between the mainland, at or near Cedar Point, and Dauphin Island, both Little and Big; also to dredge a channel from the deep waters of Mobile Bay into Dauphin Bay; also to construct and maintain docks and wharves along both Little and Big Dauphin Islands, as amended by an act approved June 18, 1912; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. SMITH of Maryland:

A bill (S. 4478) to provide for the condemnation of land for highway and park purposes to preserve the Klingle Ford Valley; and

A bill (S. 4479) to amend an act approved June 8, 1906, entitled "An act to amend section 1 of an act entitled 'An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia,' approved February 28, 1901"; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. OVERMAN:

A bill (S. 4480) providing for the establishment of two additional terms of the district court for the eastern district of North Carolina at Raleigh, N. C.; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HARDING:

A bill (S. 4484) to incorporate the Boy Scouts of America, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HARDWICK:

A bill (S. 4485) for the relief of the estate of Joseph Lippman, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. HUGHES:

A bill (S. 4486) to amend section 19 of the public-buildings act approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stat., 883), as amended by the act of Congress approved August 11, 1913 (38 Stat., 109); to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. JAMES:

A bill (S. 4487) granting a pension to Maude Woods (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 4488) granting a pension to George R. Hamilton (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WEEKS:

A bill (S. 4489) granting an increase of pension to Georgia B. Moulton (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 4490) to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Oklahoma; to the Committee on Fisheries.

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 4491) granting an increase of pension to Nephi Owen (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHERMAN:

A bill (S. 4492) to create a national university at the seat of the Federal Government; to the Committee on the University of the United States.

By Mr. TILLMAN:

A bill (S. 4493) to enable the Government to use private armor-making plants for the manufacture of armor; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PATENT OFFICE FEES.

By Mr. POMERENE:

A bill (S. 4477) to extend temporarily the time for filing applications and fees and taking action in the United States Patent Office, in favor of nations granting reciprocal rights to United States citizens; to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. POMERENE. As explaining the purpose and necessity for this bill, I have a letter from the law firm of Hull, Smith, Brock & West, of Cleveland, and, without reading it, I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

CLEVELAND, February 5, 1916.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In accordance with the request in your letter of January 31, 1916, we inclose herewith a proposed draft of an act to extend temporarily the time of filing fees and applications and of taking actions in the Patent Office. In preparing this draft the writer has consulted members of the committee on industrial property and has carried in mind the legislation proposed to the last Congress. The former legislation was adversely criticized as ambiguous and indefinite, particularly as permitting the grant of patents to foreigners upon devices which may have been published or in use more than two years. The writer has avoided this objection by requiring a prior filing in the applicant's home country within the time specified by law.

Under the present legislation, as you are doubtless aware, a citizen of any one of the convention countries, after having filed application in his home country, is entitled to file similar applications in any of the other countries within one year and obtain the effective date of his home application; but if he waits for more than a year he loses the benefit of this date, and any use or publication prior to his actual filing becomes a bar as to his patent. Similarly under the United States law an applicant has one year in which to reply to most official actions, and a stated time to reply to other actions, and failure to take action within those times effects a positive abandonment of his application. The purpose of this legislation is to extend these times up to a limit of nine months in favor of the subjects and citizens of those countries who have done the same for us.

Certain European Governments, notably France, started soon after the war broke out to afford substantially these facilities to the citizens of all countries, but later restricted their operation to those citizens or subjects only whose Governments had extended equal rights in return. It is of even greater importance to Americans to obtain these facilities of delay, with respect to their foreign patents, than it is for the foreign subjects to obtain such facilities in respect of their United States patents, for all European countries exact the payment within fixed times of annual taxes for their patents, in default of which the patents become void. Also nearly all the countries demand annual or biennial workings of their patents under similar penalty. In many cases the operation of war has been to prevent applications, tax payments, working directions, amendments, and the like from reaching their destinations, either by being sunk in mid-ocean or by being delayed beyond the times allotted. Also thousands of American owners of foreign patents have hesitated about incurring the expense of maintaining their foreign patents (or even applying for them originally), because of their uncertainty as to the outcome of the war and of the financial and economic condition in Europe at its close. The passage of this legislation, or other legislation having substantially the same end in view, would automatically restore the rights of these American owners of foreign patents and will otherwise greatly facilitate their transaction of business with foreign offices. Also, it can not be seen that any detriment will accrue to the American public, in view of the safeguards proposed.

In amending this proposed legislation care should be taken not to introduce such limitations as should render it unfairly inferior to the reciprocal legislation adopted by France and other belligerent countries. It is believed that the bill as drawn is about as narrow as could safely be proposed.

We shall be much gratified if you will take this matter up with the Committee on Patents and with others whom you think should be approached. We are sending a copy of this bill to Hon. WILLIAM GORDON, of the House of Representatives, and to the Commissioner of Patents.

Very respectfully,

HULL, SMITH, BROCK & WEST,
By H. E. SMITH.

SYSTEM OF PUBLIC HIGHWAYS.

By Mr. SHIELDS:

A bill (S. 4483) to provide for the preparation and report to Congress by the Chief of Engineers of the Army under the direction and through the Secretary of War of a preliminary plan for a system of improved national highways, and to provide for the payment of the expenses of said report; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SHIELDS. Bearing upon the bill, and in relation to it, I desire to have printed in the RECORD an article by Lieut. Col. Henry T. Allen, Eleventh United States Cavalry, written upon the subject of the improvement of roads as a military asset and the desirability of a line of road from the Lakes to the Gulf. The article is very short, and I ask that it be printed.

There being no objection, the article referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE DIXIE HIGHWAY AS A MILITARY ASSET.

[Lieut. Col. Henry T. Allen, Eleventh United States Cavalry.]

Warfare of the present day demands, more than ever, rapid transportation of large bodies of men and enormous supplies of munitions and provisions. It is not enough to have a superior system of railways in any given zone. This must be supplemented by highways, because in the final state the thousands of tons required daily by a modern army reach the firing line by motor trucks and horse-drawn vehicles.

Good roads will assure numerous motor vehicles such as characterize the western war front in Europe at the present time by their numbers. The efficiency of a good motor truck on a good road is at least four times that of a horse-drawn vehicle, the cost and maintenance of which is the same as that of the truck. In fact, in future wars the motor truck will rank next to the railway trains in carrying military supplies.

In general, the following represents the carrying of supplies to the firing line:

First. Railway or steamboat transportation from the large bases of supply to the railway heads or boat terminals.

Second. Thence by motor trucks to the divisional bases.

Third. Thence by horse-drawn vehicles to the firing lines.

In the Dixie Highway we find a magnificent line from Chicago through manufacturing centers, including Indianapolis, Louisville, Nashville, Chattanooga, Atlanta, and Tallahassee, and another line from the very heart of the Great Lakes, Mackinaw, through the following important cities: Detroit, Toledo, Dayton Cincinnati, Knoxville, Chattanooga, Atlanta, thence to Jacksonville. In a word, the great Gulf and the Great Lakes are joined by a wonderful highway passing through a section of the country that has always furnished more than its quota of soldiers for every war in which the Nation has been engaged. Due to its geographical position, its population, its food production, and its manufacturing capacity this section may well be considered the greatest military asset of any large part of the United States.

It has been claimed that the construction of good highways would be aiding a foreign foe landing on our shores. While this is true, it would be a still greater aid to the defense in the ready mobilization of all its forces and in supplying the resisting lines promptly with men and munitions. If such a misfortune should happen to the United States as to have a coalition force land on our eastern seaboard, the Dixie Highway, with its numerous manufacturing cities and its vast supply centers—all well connected—would offer most advantageous sites for supply bases and would constitute a highly important base line sufficiently far from the coast to be reasonably safe from air craft yet sufficiently close for many war requirements. If it should become necessary to resist an enemy from the direction of the great Gulf, the advantages cited for the Dixie Highway would be still greater.

The successful prosecution of a great campaign depends upon the existence or construction of roads, and the better they are the greater the chances of success will be.

The military strength of a nation depends on the quality of its citizens—upon their intelligence and virility. No nation can have an armed force better than the standard of its average citizen. The capacity and effectiveness of these are determined in peace; they are simply accentuated by war training. Therefore, the nation or state that increases its miles of good roads and the quality of the same improves the quality of its citizenship, increases its wealth in farm and factory, and adds to its military assets.

It is in this indirect manner that the Dixie Highway will prove its greater value as a military asset for the Nation. This idea is vividly exemplified in Russia and Germany. Standing on the frontier between these two countries a careful inspection shows a marked contrast in the appearance of the cultivation of the country, in the roads, in the houses, and the school buildings looking east from that looking west. The average education and effectiveness of the respective citizens are equally contrasted. It necessarily follows that the Russian and German armies should show a corresponding contrast, and the results thus far obtained confirm this.

Probably no branch of the Government is more keenly interested in the completion of the Dixie Highway than the Army, and to no branch can it have a more important bearing. With the inevitable change in our military policy, involving the concentration and organization in time of peace of such commands as would be required in war, the country between the Lakes and Florida will have an added military interest in which the Dixie Highway will prove its great military value.

AMENDMENTS TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MYERS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,000 for the erection of a building for the display of Indian exhibits at the fair grounds of the Western Montana Fair Association at Missoula, Mont., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill (H. R. 10385), which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $5,000 for the improvement and maintenance for bath purposes of the Camas Hot Springs near the town of Camas on the Flathead Indian Reservation, Mont., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill (H. R. 10385), which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

PROHIBITION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the bill (S. 1082) to prevent the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia. I ask that the amendment may be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Shall it go to the committee or lie on the table?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let it lie on the table and be printed, as the bill has already been reported to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

CLAIM OF PRAIRIE COUNTY, ARK.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the bill (S. 1878) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, and under the provisions of section No. 151 of the act approved March 3, 1911, commonly known as the Judicial Code. I ask that the amendment be read, printed, and lie on the table until the bill to which it refers may come under consideration.

The amendment was ordered to be printed and to lie on the table, and it was read, as follows:

Add as a new paragraph at the end of the bill:
"To Prairie County, Ark., $13,200."

ARMED MERCHANT SHIPS.

Mr. STERLING. I submit a resolution and ask that it be read and lie on the table.

The resolution (S. Res. 100) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States views with anxious concern the late order of the German Admiralty that armed merchant ships of any of the entente allies, without distinction as to whether armed for merely defensive purposes or not, may be torpedoed and sunk without warning after the 29th of the present month; that such order, if put into effect, will constitute a more serious menace to the legitimate commerce of all neutral nations, and particularly to that of the United States, than any act of any of the belligerents in the present European war, and will be in contravention of a right long recognized by the principal commercial nations of the world, including our own; that the protection of the interests of neutral commerce on the high seas in time of war has been the subject of many treaties and conventions and is a favored subject in international law, and that through these instrumentalities the freedom of such commerce and the cause of civilization itself have been greatly promoted; that any recognition on the part of the United States of the claim that the necessities of war in general or the exigencies and conditions of modern submarine warfare are warrant for the order of the German Admiralty would be a step backward and so far an abandonment of our contention for the freedom of the seas. Moreover, such recognition would contravene the policy of the Government of the United States as expressed in the notes of our State Department to the British and German Governments, respectively, on the 26th of September and November 7, 1914, and that at this time in the history of the present war there should be no acquiescence in the order of the German Admiralty on the part of this or any other neutral power.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. STERLING. I desire to give notice that on Friday next, following the conclusion of the morning business, I shall address the Senate on the resolution.

Mr. LODGE. I believe the resolution is to lie on the table for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was the request of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to give notice that I shall address the Senate upon the resolution at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from South Dakota.

PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION OF GASOLINE.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, some time ago the Senate passed a resolution seeking to secure from the Interior Department certain information concerning the production, consumption, and prices, abnormal and otherwise, of gasoline. The report of the Secretary of the Interior is very full and complete and is replete with very valuable information. That report has been submitted as a Senate document.

While possibly the report itself does not answer directly the principal matter which the average American may have in mind concerning the extraordinary rise in the price of gasoline, at least inferentially it indicates the cause. I can say briefly that the report indicates, first, that there is no very close relation at any time between the cost of the crude-oil production and that of the finished article; secondly, that the depressions and rises in the price seem to be fixed by something other than the question of supply and demand; and, third, that there have been some enormous dividends declared upon the stock of the great refining companies.

There may be quite a serious question as to what particular committee should investigate this subject. With the vast increase in the amount of gasoline used upon the farm and the use of the cheaper automobiles upon the farm it seems to me that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry might well take the matter under consideration. I ask that the matter be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry for consideration and investigation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have just read, Mr. President, a supplement to the annual report of the Attorney General of the United States for the year 1915. The supplement deals entirely with the withdrawal of oil lands and also the litigation concerning the depletion of some of the oil fields in California. I ask, therefore, that the report made by the Attorney General upon this subject, which has already been presented to the Senate, be printed as a Senate document and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, in connection with Senate Document No. 310 already referred to that Committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his clerks, announced that the President had, on February 15, 1916, approved and signed the following act and joint resolution:

S. 900. An act amending sections 476, 477, and 440 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and

S. J. Res. 76. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to loan 1,000 tents and 1,000 cots for the use of the encampment of the United Confederate Veterans to be held at Birmingham, Ala., in May, 1916.

PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION.

H. R. 8810. An act to amend an act relating to the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia approved March 4, 1913, was read twice by its title.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that bill. It is a duplicate of one on the calendar which has been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia. There will be no controversy about it, and I am sure it will not take three minutes to dispose of it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator what bill it is.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is a bill to relieve from the jurisdiction of the Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia an electric line that runs into Virginia for about 50 miles, I think, and has not 50 feet of track in the District of Columbia. It merely has a terminal here. The bill has passed the House and has come to the Senate in a message. I simply ask that it may be taken up and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 8, paragraph 1, of an act entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1913, relating to the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia (37 Stat. L., p. 975), be amended by adding to the names of the companies excluded from the operation of said section, after the words "the Potomac River and Chesapeake Bay," in the third subdivision of said paragraph, on page 975, the following: "and the Washington & Old Dominion Railway, excepting as to the regulation of its operation inside of the District of Columbia."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask that Senate bill 3998 on the calendar and covering the same subject be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate bill will be postponed indefinitely.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

H. R. 7571. An act to provide for the appointment of the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia;

H. R. 7585. An act to provide for the appointment of the register of wills of the District of Columbia by the justices of the Supreme Court of said District;

H. R. 9803. An act to emancipate from certain disabilities children who have judgments of conviction for crime of record against them in the juvenile court of the District of Columbia; and

H. R. 10490. An act to prevent fraudulent advertising in the District of Columbia.

CENTRAL POWER PLANT.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, may I ask at this time to bring up the resolution which I submitted on yesterday?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California calls up the resolution submitted by him, coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 99) submitted by Mr. PHELAN on the 14th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury, as permitted by the power-plant contract, be requested to modify the plans, as far as possible, to better harmonize with the Burnham plans for the improvement of the commercial water front and with the general beauty and comfort of the city of Washington.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from California that, in place of using the term "Burnham plans," he uses the words "Park Commission plans." Mr. Burnham was a member of that commission, and, of course, its leading spirit, but nevertheless the plan was worked out by a commission.

Mr. PHELAN. I accept the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire, and will so modify the resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will take the liberty to say just one word, and that is I think the resolution is a very wise one, and I trust that the Secretary of the Treasury will take the matter in hand with a view to making the plan as ornamental as it is possible to make a plan of that kind.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from California is it his purpose to ask that the resolution be acted upon at this time?

Mr. PHELAN. It is my request that the resolution be acted upon at this time.

Mr. GALLINGER. The resolution, under the rule, went over on yesterday.

Mr. BRYAN. It does not occur to me that, without reference to a committee or without further consideration, the resolution should pass this morning. The resolution requests the Secretary of the Treasury to modify the plans of the power-plant building. If the Secretary complies with the request contained in this resolution he will modify the plan. Nobody knows how much that would cost or what changes would be made.

It seems to me, Mr. President, the resolution ought to go before a committee. The Fine Arts Commission had their day in court on yesterday. They are opposed to the erection of this power plant. According to Senators who took that view of the matter, there is no way in which to harmonize the plan of the Treasury Department with the plan they have in view. It seems to me that about all that could be accomplished by this resolution would be that the Secretary of the Treasury would ignore it or that he would stop the building and change his plans. We do not know what appropriation that would call for or what would be the result of the action. It occurs to me that the Senate disposed of the power and heating plant proposition on yesterday, and that we ought to go ahead with the legislation that has been agreed to in conference. Therefore I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Library. I do that in deference to the request of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. I do not know what the Committee on the Library has to do with a building which is so far removed from the Library.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The resolution ought to go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. BRYAN. It seems to me that the resolution ought to go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. NEWLANDS rose.

Mr. BRYAN. I do not, however, care to get into any dispute about it. If the Senator from Nevada, who has taken very great interest in this matter, wants the resolution to go to the Committee on the Library, I yield to his wishes, and make the motion that it be referred to that committee.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to say that I am in favor of the present consideration of the resolution offered by the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], but when the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] seemed to be in doubt as to which committee he should ask the reference of the resolution I suggested to him the Committee on the Library, because that is the committee under whose jurisdiction a question of art rests and is the committee from which the Fine Arts Commission sprang.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I should like to state, more particularly for the information of the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN], that the contract for this building invests the Secretary of the Treasury, as I understand it, with the power to modify the plans. I can not imagine that any considerable expense will be involved in such modification as the resolution contemplates, in order to bring the building into harmony with the larger plans for the adornment of Washington. It may involve architectural treatment of the building itself, which now possibly is perfectly plain, or it may involve the construction of ornamental chimneys. However, we know that there is in existence a plan for the improvement of the commercial water front of Washington, which involves an esplanade, and the idea is to have in view the general character of that structure, so that the new building will harmonize with it.

I do not think it is such a serious matter that it should involve the attention of a committee, but the Secretary of the Treasury has that power, and the resolution will request that he exercise it. I have from the Secretary of the Treasury a letter, which I shall ask to have read, which may set at rest the doubts of the Senator from Florida as to the attitude of the Secretary himself in this matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letter sent to the desk by the Senator from California will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, February 15, 1916.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your letter of the 14th instant reached me at my house last evening. Personally, I have no objection to the resolution you have offered concerning the plans for the central heating, lighting, and power plant, nor to any other action concerning this plant which the Congress may deem it wise to take. I may say, however, that without regard to the resolution you have offered, it is my purpose to do everything in my power to make the plans of the power house as artistic as possible and to harmonize them in every reasonable way with any plans already adopted or projected for the improvement and beautification of Washington. I have at all times been willing, and still am willing, to receive the suggestions and recommendations of the Fine Arts Commission or any other competent person or persons respecting the design and artistic features of the power house. It is not, however, within my province to change the location or site of the power house, that having been determined by an act of Congress passed before I became Secretary of the Treasury.

Faithfully, yours,

W. G. MCADOO.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
United States Senate.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, in view of that letter, I withdraw my objection to the present consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from California to the fact that it seems to me the resolution assumes that the plans which have been adopted are not in harmony with the so-called Burnham plan, and if we pass this resolution and the Secretary of the Treasury should feel, as he perhaps might justly feel, that it was the desire of the Senate that these plans be modified, he would accordingly modify them. Suppose, however, that the plans are already in harmony with the so-called Burnham plan—I do not know whether they are or not; but the only objection I can see to the resolution is that it assumes that they are not—he is asked to modify the plans so that they will harmonize with the Burnham plan. I should like to inquire of the Senator if he knows that the plans for the building are not in harmony with the so-called Burnham plan?

Mr. PHELAN. The resolution requests the Secretary of the Treasury to modify the plans, as far as possible, and so forth.

The plan of the Park Commission, otherwise known as the Burnham plan, contemplates the construction of an esplanade, running from a point near the railroad embankment to the War College. I inspected the site of the new power plant last Sunday morning, and found that it was involved in the construction of that esplanade, so that the object of the resolution is to harmonize the architecture of the new building, which I understand is now perfectly plain, and the chimneys or smokestacks, so that there would be a general harmony between the two structures. It does not involve, of course, changing the site nor anything that is material. It is a mere direction to the Secretary.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand it does not involve a change of site; but does the Senator, from his examination, if he has examined the plans, believe that the present plans for the proposed building are not in harmony with the plans of the Park Commission?

Mr. PHELAN. I believe the present plans for the new building are not in harmony with the Park Commission plans.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury, as permitted by the power-plant contract, be requested to modify the plans, as far as possible, to better harmonize with the Park Commission plans for the improvement of the commercial water front and with the general beauty and comfort of the city of Washington.

MANUFACTURE OF ARMOR.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I ask that the bill (S. 1417) to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Chair lays before the Senate the bill (S. 1417) to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask that the report of the committee accompanying the bill be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The report (No. 115) submitted by Mr. TILLMAN on the 8th instant was read, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1417) to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report it with an amendment.

The relation of the United States Government to the armor-plate manufacturers has been a continual source of dissatisfaction to those Members of Congress who really do not believe in the doctrine of favoritism to special interests, or in the protective system at all, and a condition has existed little short of scandalous. From 1887, when Secretary Whitney made the first contract with the Bethlehem Co., to 1915, when Secretary Daniels refused to award any contracts at all, investigation has followed investigation without result.

The very nature of the armor-plate business makes such a condition inevitable. There is only one customer in the United States for the product—the Government—and the large capital required to found an armor plant excludes all but the largest concerns from the business.

There are only three manufacturers of armor plate in this country, and the result is either a monopoly or a combine of the worst type. None of the conditions that tend to check monopoly are present. The number of manufacturers is necessarily limited, and the Government is compelled to buy their product, regardless of the price charged, because the law does not allow the Secretary of the Navy to go outside of this country to buy it. The manufacturers have no fear of private competition, for there is not sufficient demand for armor to justify the entrance of other parties. The economic principle which declares that to increase the price of a monopolistic product beyond a certain limit automatically decreases the demand for it does not obtain, because the United States Government is compelled to armor its vessels, regardless of cost. It is plain that Congress can pass as many laws as it chooses to pass and give the Secretary of the Navy as much discretion as he may ask without remedying the situation. As long as present conditions continue the armor manufacturers are in a position to force the United States Government, in the language of the highwayman, to "stand and deliver."

The committee has no desire to criticize unjustly the manufacturers of armor plate. They have done no more than most other men would have done under similar circumstances and temptations. Men in the pursuit of wealth are essentially greedy and hoggish; and the protective principle seems to have been prolific in producing some magnificent specimens. The main fact to be borne in mind is that they have more power than is compatible with the public interest. Give power to any set of men, however excellent and honorable, and sooner or later they will abuse it. Men have been built that way since the beginning of time.

The history of armor-plate making in America is interesting and significant in view of the foregoing observations.

The change from wooden ships to ships of iron and steel was authorized by the act of August 5, 1882, which orders—

"That no part of this sum shall be applied to the repairs of any wooden ship when the estimated cost of such repairs shall exceed 30 per cent of the estimated cost of a new ship of the same size and like material."

Secretary of the Navy W. E. Chandler really began the new Navy, for he made the contract with the John Roach Co. for the first four iron ships—the Atlanta, Baltimore, Chicago, and Dolphin. The Dolphin is still in active service as a dispatch boat, showing how thoroughly well it must have been built. It is now about 33 years old.

The next step was to get armor for these iron vessels. There was no armor being manufactured at all in the United States; the armor for the Miantonomoh having been imported from England at a cost of about $550 per ton. Secretary Whitney induced the Bethlehem Co. to enter upon the manufacture of armor, it having one of the largest iron plants in the country; and the price agreed on varied from five to six hundred dollars per ton. The Bethlehem Co. and the Cleveland Rolling Mill Co. were the only two concerns that bid at all. Whitney did not make a close or tight bargain, as he knew the company must necessarily be put to large expense, and he was willing to allow a liberal price on that account. He felt that it was desirable, if not absolutely necessary, that we should have armor manufacturers in the United States; and his successor, Mr. Tracy, felt that there should be more than one concern in the business, and he induced the Carnegie Steel Co. to enter it. There was a dispute with the Carnegie Co. about the price. Mr. Carnegie insisted he must receive the same price the Bethlehem people were getting or he would not touch it. Secretary Whitney further agreed for each pound of armor plate used he would set aside 2 cents to indemnify the company for any damages it might sustain for infringing on certain patents held by the Schneider Co. in France.

Having reason to believe the Carnegie and Bethlehem companies were in collusion or combination, Senator Chandler offered a resolution in the Senate instructing the committee as follows:

"To inquire whether the prices paid or agreed to be paid for armor for vessels of the Navy have been fair and reasonable; also whether any prices paid have been increased on account of patent processes used for the introduction of nickel, or for cementation by the Harvey process; and if so, whether the increases in price are fair and reasonable; whether the issuance of any of the patents was expedited at the request of the Navy Department; whether such patents were properly issued and were for inventions not previously known or used, and who were and are the owners of such patents; whether any officers of the Government were interested therein, or at the time when any contracts were made were or have since been interested in the patents or employed by the owners thereof; and whether any legislation is necessary to further promote the manufacture and cheapen the price of armor for vessels of the Navy."

This resolution passed the Senate on December 31, 1895, and under it the first senatorial investigation of armor was begun.

The first bill for the erection of an armor-plate factory was introduced on January 22, 1896, by Senator Smith, of New Jersey. This bill provided that the factory be erected in the city of Washington.

Secretary Herbert, on January 5, 1897, stated in reference to the Bethlehem plant, basing his estimates on data obtained from the company itself, that—

"Whatever may have been the cost of the armor plant and the gun plant, whatever may have been paid for the secrets of manufacture or for patents, or whatever may have been interest on working capital, all those and other charges have been paid from the gross earnings of the company; and the results show the company's investments in the plant to make armor and gun steel for the Government have been returned with 22 per cent thereon."

According to Secretary Herbert, in seven years the plant had paid for itself and in addition had returned 22 per cent of itself, and practically the same statement was made of the Carnegie Co. These facts prove the assertion often made by Senator TILLMAN—that the Government had built the plants and then given them to those two companies.

Secretary Daniels, in his current report, states:

"Since the passage of the naval act of June 7, 1900, the Navy Department has spent $76,195,960 for armor for its ships. It is believed that if the intent of Congress to order the erection of a factory had been carried out at that time the Government would have saved enough money on armor plate to own a plant as large as that owned by all three of the private companies and in the meantime to have supplied the armor plate for its own ships at a less price than it has been compelled to pay."

The facts as brought out go to prove this beyond dispute.

In 1903 the Midvale Steel Co. entered the field, but its entry has made no material difference in the situation as to cost of armor to the Government. Of course, they were lured by the hope of profit. Being skillful metallurgists and iron masters, just by walking through the Bethlehem and Carnegie works they could see that the profits were large. But that company did not build an armor plant until they had bid five times and were denied participation in the contracts because they did not have any plant in which to manufacture it. They had underbid the older companies, but the Government, for some unexplained reason, though ostensibly it was because the President or the Secretary of the Navy elected to believe that the new company could not build a plant and deliver the armor in accordance with their contract, gave the awards to Bethlehem and Carnegie.

Mr. Barba, then president of the Midvale Steel Co., stated to the Tillman committee that "I remember that our original bid contemplated beginning delivery in 26 months, during which time we hoped to be able to erect a plant that would enable us to begin delivery of the comparatively small sizes of armor which were required for the purposes of the Navy at that time." When Mr. Barba was asked, "Didn't you believe that Carnegie and Bethlehem had a good thing, and therefore you wanted to share in it?" answered "Unquestionably." To show the bias of the Navy Department in favor of Carnegie and Bethlehem, Mr. Barba testified that the Midvale Co. received about one-third of the amount—16,000 tons—needed by the department, at $397 per ton, and two-thirds was given to the Carnegie and Bethlehem companies, at $450.60 per ton.

After having been turned down five times, the construction of a plant was begun by the Midvale Co. in 1903 and had progressed so far toward completion that the Secretary of the Navy awarded them a contract, they being the lowest bidder. So far so good; this was honest competition. But once in, they were recognized by the old companies, who took them in partnership, as it were, for thereafter the price offered by each of the three did not materially vary.

The effort of the Government to obtain competition among armor makers had failed. It should be said to the credit of the Midvale Co., however, that they refused to pay a royalty to either Harvey or Krupp and defended a suit through all the courts up to the United States Supreme Court, which sustained their contention that they had done nothing for which to pay a royalty.

When the special committee, consisting of Senator TILLMAN, Congressman PADGETT, and Admiral Strauss, investigated the whole subject last year, that committee could not obtain any authoritative or reliable information whatever as to the cost of armor. There was every evidence of combination and collusion instead of competition, but no proof. But given three companies with a single fixed purchaser of their products, a consumer who is compelled to buy, and monopoly or combination, tacit or avowed, is certain to follow. The nature of the case excludes proof in a juridical sense of the term, but it invites an unerring moral conviction.

Secretary Daniels, in his last report and in his statement before the Senate Naval Committee, said the three bids in the last "competition" agreed to a cent.

The hearing before the committee brought out no new facts. The armor men of 1916 showed the same capacity for talking without saying anything as that exhibited so artistically by their brethren of earlier years. The same talk of the "value of trade secrets"; the same reluctance to talk cost of production; the same plea of having been encouraged by the Government to go into the business and the consequent unfairness of Government competition; the same inability to recognize that if such a quasi partnership as they claim exists between them and the Government they should, in all fairness, shoulder its liabilities as well as insist on its benefits; indeed, about the only material difference between the hearings of 1916 and those other numerous ones that have followed each other so regularly and so fruitlessly since 1895 is that of dates. To go into these reports would be a waste of time. They are published in pamphlet form and can be easily obtained by interested parties from the document room. The hearings before the Senate committee on this subject are also obtainable, as they have been printed.

It suffices to say that the committee is of the opinion that the Government has been charged unreasonable prices for its armor plate, and that the only remedy lies in the Government owning and operating a plant, as provided for in Senate bill 1417. Should the Government build it and then lock it up, and it never be used, it would be wise to erect it, as it would serve as a warning to private manufacturers that there is a point beyond which the Government will not be driven and where patience ceases to be a virtue.

The committee, therefore, by a vote of 9 to 3 of those present, ordered the bill reported favorably, and expresses the hope that it will soon become a law.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the report of this bill which has just been read explains some of the reasons why it is important it should pass promptly. In the speech made by me December 13, 1915, when the bill was introduced, I gave what appeared to me to be unanswerable reasons why the bill should pass, and pass without any unnecessary delay whatever. Very few Senators heard that speech, because it was delivered at the lunch hour, and very few read it, perhaps. I will take pleasure in furnishing any Senator with a pamphlet copy who desires it.

An additional reason for promptness and expedition is this: With the utmost dispatch possible, it will take from 18 months to 2 years to build this plant and get it in running order; and the threat of those who are making armor that they would charge the Government $200 per ton more for armor hereafter, if the Government constructed its own plant, which was voiced by the Senator from Pennsylvania to the committee in executive session, shows the temper of those men at this time and makes it more vital for Congress to teach them a lesson. The best answer to that threat is the passage of this bill as promptly as possible.

While the manufacture of armor is highly technical and scientific, I have no doubt whatever that the Government can find skilled mechanics who are now working for private concerns who will be glad to enter the Government service and perform the same work in its armor factory that they are now doing for private parties. Neither have I any doubt about the Government's ability to buy the necessary machinery; and it is imperatively necessary that legislation authorizing the erection of this plant, or the purchase of one of the existing plants and its enlargement, be had immediately. The longer we delay, the more money the Government will lose and the longer we will be in getting the new ships already authorized and those to be authorized by this Congress. I have no doubt that the naval program, when agreed on by the two Houses, will approximate the number of ships asked for by President Wilson, and the sooner the Government is free from any possible danger of a "holdup," such as has been threatened, the better for the Treasury and the country, too.

If the Senator from Pennsylvania were here, I would ask him to tell the Senate just what he told the committee last week; but his Republican colleagues who voted with him will remember what he said, and perhaps one of them will explain just what he meant. I confess I myself was shocked at the insolence of it—not from the Senator, because he had a right, but from the men who authorized him to speak as he did.

I believe, if the authority is given and the money provided, we can either build or buy one of the existing plants and be equipped to manufacture the amount of armor needed inside of two years; but nothing whatever can be done by the Navy Department or anyone else until Congress acts. So, the sooner Congress does pass this bill the sooner the country will begin to get ready to defend itself and, if it should be necessary, to maintain the Monroe doctrine after the European war is over. There is both time and money to be saved by the prompt passage of this bill.

Therefore I am urging its passage through the Senate as promptly as possible, expecting some little delay in the House. This bill ought to become a law early in March and the Navy Department be mobilized by furnishing it the money and the authority.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina a question. Is the Senator able to tell us what the Government is now paying for armor plate, and also what is the reasonable cost of production?

Mr. TILLMAN. My recollection is that the last contracts were for $425 per ton; but from the best information obtainable by the committee, I think, the price at which it can be manufactured is about $262 per ton.

INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE.

Mr. SHIELDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Tennessee whether he will not yield to me to request the regular order for the purpose of considering a joint resolution for the appointment of a joint subcommittee from the Interstate Commerce Committees of the Senate and House for the investigation of the transportation question? It will not take much time in debate, so I am informed, only two Senators desiring to speak upon it. I am going away to-morrow to New Haven to keep an engagement to address the chamber of commerce of that city, and I should like to have the resolution disposed of to-day. I am sure we can dispose of it before 2 o'clock. The water-power bill will come up automatically at 2 o'clock.

Mr. SHIELDS. I understood the Senator to say there would be two or three speeches on the joint resolution.

Mr. NEWLANDS. There are only two Senators that I know of who intend to speak upon it.

Mr. SHIELDS. The discussion would probably extend beyond the hour of 2 o'clock, would it not?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not think so. I feel quite sure that it would be closed before 2 o'clock. We have already had quite an extended debate upon the joint resolution. It is simply for the appointment of a joint subcommittee of the Committees on Interstate Commerce of the Senate and the House.

Mr. SHIELDS. Will the Senator agree that the matter shall be laid aside at 2 o'clock?

Mr. NEWLANDS. At 2 o'clock, if the Senator insists on it; yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. I certainly shall insist on it. I can not yield for any measure that will extend beyond the time stated or in any way sidetrack the water-power measure.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that unless it is satisfactory to the Senator from Tennessee, I will not urge its continuation beyond 2 o'clock.

Mr. SHIELDS. It will not be satisfactory to the Senator from Tennessee or those supporting this measure. I can only yield on the express condition that the joint resolution shall be laid aside at 2 o'clock. I understand that that is the agreement?

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is the understanding.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution 60. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I object to that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I move then that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to inquire of the Senator why we should not take up the calendar in regular order. Then the joint resolution would be reached in regular order.

Mr. NEWLANDS. As I have said, there are urgent reasons for action on the joint resolution. The matter has been debated a number of times and it has been under consideration for some time. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All in favor of the motion of the Senator from Nevada will say "aye." Those opposed, "no." The "ayes" seem to have it. The "ayes" have it. The Chair lays the joint resolution before the Senate.

Mr. SHIELDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request was made and refused.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] desires to address the Senate on the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution is before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 60) creating a joint subcommittee from the membership of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to investigate the conditions relating to interstate and foreign commerce, and the necessity of further legislation relating thereto, and defining the powers and duties of such subcommittee.

Mr. BORAH. What is the status of the joint resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed by the clerks at the desk that on January 25 the joint resolution was read in full, and that there are amendments of the Committee on Interstate Commerce which have not yet been acted upon.

Mr. BORAH. I do not desire to discuss it until after the committee amendments are disposed of.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then I ask that the amendments be considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 5, after the word "investigate," strike out the words "and report upon the subject of the regulation of interstate and foreign commerce" and insert "the subject of the Government control and regulation of interstate and foreign transportation, the efficiency of the existing system in protecting the rights of shippers and carriers and in promoting the public interest, the incorporation or control of the incorporation of carriers, and all proposed changes in the organization of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the act to regulate commerce," so as to read:

That the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate and the Committee of the House of Representatives on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, through a joint subcommittee to consist of five Senators and five Representatives, who shall be selected by said committees, respectively, be, and they hereby are, appointed to investigate the subject of the Government control and regulation of interstate and foreign transportation, the efficiency of the existing system in protecting the rights of shippers and carriers and in promoting the public interest, the incorporation or control of the incorporation of carriers, and all proposed changes in the organization of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the act to regulate commerce, with authority, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 18, after the word "Congress," strike out "on or before the third Monday in December next" and insert "as expeditiously as may be," so as to read:

With authority to sit during the recess of Congress, with power to summon witnesses, to appoint necessary experts, clerks, and stenographers, and to do whatever is necessary for a full and comprehensive examination and study of the subject, and report to Congress as expeditiously as may be.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 19, after the word "that," strike out "a sum sufficient" and insert "the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as is necessary," so as to read:

That the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as is necessary to carry out the purposes of this resolution and to pay the necessary expenses of the subcommittee and its members, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is lost.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is entirely satisfactory.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no further amendments——

Mr. NEWLANDS. The committee recommends that the preamble be stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That comes up after the joint resolution is passed, if it ever is passed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the vital portion of the joint resolution authorizing the investigation reads as follows:

The subject of the Government control and regulation of interstate and foreign transportation, the efficiency of the existing system in protecting the rights of shippers and carriers and in promoting the public interest, the incorporation or control of the incorporation of carriers, and all proposed changes in the organization of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the act to regulate commerce.

Thus the joint resolution would authorize the investigation of this particular subject matter by a committee.

I have offered an amendment, after the word "commerce," on page 3, to insert the following:

Also the subject of Government ownership of all public utilities, such as telegraph, telephone, express companies, and railroads engaged in interstate and foreign commerce and report as to the wisdom or feasibility of Government ownership of such utilities and as to the comparative worth and efficiency of Government regulation and control as compared with Government ownership and operation.

Mr. President, when I offered this amendment I did not have it in mind to disturb unduly the minds of those who are opposed to Government ownership. The amendment is offered purely for educational purposes, for the purpose of ascertaining the facts with reference to a matter which some time or other I have no doubt we shall have to meet in this country. The joint resolution, of course, with this amendment would not commit the Senate nor anyone favoring it to the proposition of Government ownership. It would only provide for the investigation of a feature of the subject of transportation. It should be considered as an inquiry into a live question, a question upon which opinions are being made up.

The subject of Government ownership is inseparably connected with the question of transportation generally. No one undertakes to discuss in these days the subject of the efficiency of our transportation system without discussing the subject of Government ownership. Whether they are for it or against it, it seems to inhere in every discussion which takes place upon this subject.

I observe that in several discussions of late upon this subject of transportation by men who are thoroughly capable of discussing the question from every standpoint they have all felt the necessity of discussing the question of public ownership, either for it or against it. It is a live question both in the literature upon this subject and in the public discussions of the day.

About 20 years ago we began the system of regulation and control of the transportation facilities of this country. Now, after 20 years we propose to enter upon a thorough investigation of that system which we actually inaugurated many years ago. I advocate the proposition of entering upon an investigation of a feature of this transportation question in advance of the time when we shall be called on to pass upon the question rather than subsequent to the actual legislation. It seems to me a wise rule to look before you leap and to investigate before you legislate. Let us include, therefore, in our investigation all possible phases of the question.

I have before me the speech of the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] made a few days ago in Chicago, in which he refers to this question of public ownership in his discussion of the question of the efficiency of our transportation system. I call attention to it not because he either advocates or opposes the proposition, but because in discussing the general question he felt called upon to refer to the question of public ownership for the reason, I assume, that he felt it to be a part of the subject under discussion, to wit, transportation.

I have also before me the address of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], in which he discussed at length the question of public ownership some time ago in the city of Baltimore.

I have on my desk the article of Mr. KAHN upon the transportation and railroad question, in which he discusses the question of public ownership; also that of Mr. Dunn, the able and brilliant editor of the Railway Gazette, who refers to the subject. None of these gentlemen, as I understand, are in favor of public ownership, yet they have felt the necessity of studying it, of inquiring into it as a practical proposition, and of expressing their views upon the subject to those before whom they were called to speak or to whom they addressed their literature.

I might cite numerous instances to the effect that this is a part and parcel of the transportation subject in this country. It will be more so when the great conflict in Europe shall have closed. In my judgment the things which have transpired in an industrial way in the countries now at war in Europe since the beginning of the war will have moved forward the question of public ownership of public utilities more rapidly than without the war the question would have gone within the next 50 years.

The most efficient industrial unit in the civilized world at the beginning of this war was the German nation, and it will still be, in all probability, at the close of the war the most efficient, the most thoroughly organized, the best equipped industrial unit in the industrial world.

There are a great many people who believe that one of the effective instruments of German industrial efficiency is that the public utilities of Germany are in public ownership. Her railroad system belongs to the Government, and it will be asked, if these things are essential and indispensable to efficiency and success in war, why are they not also efficient and beneficial in time of peace?

Both England and France have in the emergency which has confronted them felt called upon to follow, in a very large measure, in the course mapped out by Germany with reference to her industrial and transportation questions. France and England have both moved forward in public ownership since the beginning of the war at a tremendous rate, and, in my judgment, will not move back to the original status after the war shall have closed.

Our literature, Mr. President, is teeming with arguments pro and con superinduced and caused by conditions growing out of the war as to the efficiency, the wisdom, or the unwisdom of public ownership of public utilities. We will unquestionably, as evidenced by the able men who are discussing this question before the public, though not in favor of it, be called upon to meet this subject, not only here in the halls of legislation, but in public discussion generally.

If that be true, why should we not have as a part of this subject and a part of the work of this commission a thorough study and investigation of this important question? If it be, as is supposed by some, a menace; if it be true, as it is contended by many, that Government ownership would mean practically the end of the kind of a government which we have, all the more reason, Mr. President, why there should be a thorough study in advance, and long in advance, of the time when we should be called on to pass upon it. Can we begin a thorough and deliberate investigation, a full and conscientious study of so tremendous a question too soon.

I am a believer that with proper information and thorough discussion you may leave these subjects very safely to the judgment of the American people. I am, on the other hand, aware that nations, the same as individuals, make fearful mistakes by reason of a failure to investigate the subject upon which they are called to pass in advance of the time when they are called upon to dispose of it.

I offered this amendment, as I said, purely as an educational proposition, for the purpose of gathering the data and the information which may be had upon the subject, so that we may have it, that the public may have it, and that we may consider it in the light of the facts and that the public may reflect upon it in the light of the facts. No one will deny that there are not only hundreds but thousands of people in this country who are earnestly in favor of public ownership now. If it be true that it is unwise, and facts, as said by the Senator from Massachusetts at Baltimore a few days ago, will prove it to be unwise, why should anyone who is opposed to public ownership oppose the investigation and the revealment of the facts?

Mr. KAHN, in his illuminating article in the World's Work of the last issue, in referring to this subject of what American railroads need, said:

> It is in every way a far better system than Government ownership of railroads—

That is, the regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission—> which, wherever tested, has proved its inferiority, except only in Germany, and the very reasons which have made government ownership measurably successful in Germany are the reasons which in America would make it nothing short of an economic calamity, being given political and other circumstances as they now exist and are likely to continue to exist for a long time to come.

Perhaps the writer is correct, but able men are presenting the other side. I would like to see Mr. KAHN's views elaborated before a committee. They would be worth while.

A gentleman entertaining the views that Mr. KAHN does, that it would be an economic calamity, ought to be most aggressive in favor of disclosing the facts which would satisfy any reasonable mind that it would be an economic calamity.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to ask the Senator whether, as a matter of fact, those who oppose the amendment which the Senator offered have not the burden of proof upon them to show why it should not be adopted. What is the purpose of this investigation, in other words, unless it shall cover every phase of the pending railroad situation, the most prominent of which in the public mind is precisely that which the Senator in his amendment covers? I should like to know what the argument against it is, and why the joint resolution was not so drawn as to include this very important feature of the investigation.

Mr. BORAH. I have been led to believe that there were those connected with the committee or on the committee who thought that probably it did cover the question of Government ownership. I offered this amendment in the interest of clarity of language, so that there could be no doubt about the matter; and when I found that there was opposition I came to the conclusion that the committee as a committee, notwithstanding the view of some individual members, was opposed to it.

I agree with the Senator from Colorado that the burden of proof rests upon those who are opposing it, for the reason that it is inseparably a part of the transportation question. It is so much a part of it that those who are most opposed to it feel the necessity of discussing it and criticizing it upon every public occasion, and if they be correct in their opposition they ought to assist in the passage of this amendment to make no question about the investigation of the subject.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in connection with the question asked by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], I should like, with the permission of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], to call attention to the fact that several days ago, when we were discussing this resolution, I think the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] gave as one of the reasons for its introduction and passage that we ought not to legislate during a campaign, but that the question ought to be considered when there was no politics in the country, and, therefore, he thought the resolution ought to be passed now, so as to take the question over beyond the next election. I called attention in that discussion—and I think the Senator from Nevada will agree with this—that the resolution really comes here because of the request contained in the last address to Congress by the President.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield for a moment, I merely wish to say that I was necessarily absent from the Chamber on the occasion referred to by the Senator from Nebraska, being engaged in committee work; but I do not understand that this resolution, if it shall pass to-day, could be carried out and reported back to the Senate before another election shall have been held.

Mr. NORRIS. It is not intended to do that. It is simply a peg upon which to hang a reason for those who want to have that kind of a reason, why we did not legislate on the transportation question.

Mr. THOMAS. If it is not intended to do that, if such is not the purpose, then surely that is an added argument in support of the proposition that no harm could come—even political harm—in extending and expanding the terms of this resolution so as to include an investigation of the most important feature in the railroad situation to-day.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not making any suggestion in opposition to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. THOMAS. I understood the Senator from Nebraska perfectly.

Mr. NORRIS. I think, if the amendment of the Senator from Idaho shall be adopted, it will be the meat of the whole thing. It has not any other meat in it, in my judgment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Idaho will permit me, in reply to the Senator from Nebraska, I have to state that whilst it is my individual opinion that it will be much better to take up these very important questions at the next session, rather than at this, when we have so much pressure of legislation upon us, when the consideration of politics really outweighs almost everything else, yet it is my intention, if this committee is organized, to proceed immediately with this investigation; and if any of this legislation can be shaped in such a way as to present it to this Congress, I shall urge it when an opportunity offers.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the portion of the President's message upon which, as I understand, this resolution is based reads as follows:

> The transportation problem is an exceedingly serious and pressing one in this country. There has from time to time of late been reason to fear that our railroads would not much longer be able to cope with it successfully, as at present equipped and coordinated. I suggest that it would be wise to provide for a commission of inquiry to ascertain by a thorough canvass of the whole question whether our laws as at present framed and administered are as serviceable as they might be in the solution of the problem. It is obviously a problem that lies at the very foundation of our efficiency as a people. Such an inquiry ought to draw out every circumstance and opinion worth considering, and we need to know all sides of the matter if we mean to do anything in the field of Federal legislation.

No one will contend that you can "know all sides of the matter," or that you will draw out all opinions in regard to the transportation question, or that it will be thorough and efficient unless you include what you might say is one-half of the entire question—that is, whether or not regulation and control are breaking down; and, if so, what is going to take their place. Can you know "all sides" of this subject if you confine your inquiry to regulation? Will you not in advance show that you do not want to "know all sides"? Those who feel so thoroughly satisfied that Government ownership is bad should not hesitate to present that side of the transportation question.

There are a great many people in this country—men in business, students of the subject—who believe that regulation and control are breaking down. The railroads are not satisfied. Mr. KAHN shows beyond question in his article, from their standpoint and from their viewpoint, that there must be changes in order that the railroads may thrive or do business in this country at all. He shows very clearly, admitting his premise, that under the present system and under the present powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission as administered by it, the railroads can not prosper; that they can not thrive; that they can not even keep up to what he argues is now their diminished efficiency. If regulation and control are so discredited that you must overhaul the entire system and practically start again from the beginning to find out whether or not we are upon the right track and whether or not that is the proper method of dealing with the transportation question, how are you going to separate that great problem from the other question of whether or not public ownership is not more desirable, as it has proven, they claim, in Germany, than regulation through commission?

Mr. President, it was solely in the interest of ascertaining the facts and for educational purposes, and for that alone, that I offered this amendment. We shall just as surely be called upon to meet that question within the lifetime of men who are sitting in this Senate as time goes on. We may reject public ownership. If we reject it, we want to reject it wisely. On the other hand, we do not want to adopt it and enter upon such a tremendous task and far-reaching policy without the most thorough investigation, carried on not for a day or for a fortnight or for a few months, but through years in advance of action upon the subject. Could there be any time too soon to enter upon the investigation of such a question as this which, in the minds of many people, will involve even the life of the Government which we have?

I referred a few moments ago to an address by Mr. Dunn, editor of the Railway Gazette, in which he discusses this subject under the head "The Government and business." In this address he says:

> In brief, we have seen the Government, by the repeal of some laws, by the manifestation of increased zeal in enforcing others, and by the passage of still others, withdrawing a helping hand from business of many kinds, and at the same time imposing on them and others new and heavy burdens and restrictions.
> While everybody has been sure that his business ought to be given public support and ought not to be subjected to public control, everybody has also been convinced that almost everybody else's business ought not to be given public support and ought to be subjected to public control.
> Between the socialists and those who believe merely in Government regulation of business is a large number of persons who favor public ownership and management of certain classes of concerns. Some of these advocate public ownership only of so-called "public utilities." Others would include coal mines, and so on. Indeed there is hardly a kind of business concern the public ownership of which is not advocated by one group of persons or another who at the same time deny that they are socialists.
> The extreme advocates of Government regulation tend to become advocates of Government ownership. The advanced advocates of Government ownership are scarcely distinguishable from, and tend to become socialists. It is plain, therefore, where a continuance of the growth of public sentiment in favor of Government interference with and control of business, and of legislation resulting from the growth of that sentiment, would ultimately take us.
> Many are now beginning to realize this and to awake to the fact that the amount and variety of regulatory legislation already passed are so great that there are few concerns of substantial size in the country that are not being directly affected by it.
> Our policy of Government regulation must bear a large part of the responsibility for the condition which for some years has prevailed, and still to a great extent prevails, in the transportation industry and for the adverse influence it has exerted on all kinds of business and all classes of people.

This entire address is well worth any man's reading and rereading. It shows we are far, far removed from a satisfactory solution of the problem of transportation. While of course it does not support Government ownership, yet it does lead one to reflect that if we have so fearfully failed we ought not to stop short of a patient, unbiased, and broad-minded review of the whole subject of transportation and gather to ourselves the experience and the wisdom of all Governments which have dealt with the subject. We ought not to be afraid to inquire nor too proud to learn.

Now, if Mr. KAHN and Mr. Dunn and other men—and no one will challenge their capacity to deal with the subject from their viewpoint—are of the opinion that regulation through the Interstate Commerce Commission as it now exists is responsible for what they state, in so many words, is the paralyzed condition of the transportation system of the country, and that is revealed and satisfactorily shown to the committee, the question which will arise in every man's mind will be whether or not the present system may not be successfully supplanted by public ownership. You can not have a discussion of that question nor a consideration of it from any broad or comprehensive standpoint at all without including it in the scope of the proposed inquiry. No man undertakes to discuss the transportation question without including it; and yet we are about to enter upon an investigation which, as the President says, shall draw forth the opinion of all men in regard to the subject, and which shall be thorough and complete, and which, as the President says, shall embody the views of all as to different methods of the treatment of the question.

Something of the seriousness of the railroad question may be gathered from what promises to be a strike within the next few months or weeks. Let us review, Mr. President, very briefly the issues which are to come up in that contention, for nothing could more thoroughly illustrate the proposition that the regulative system has not thus far been a success. Any system which subordinates the great transportation facilities of the country to a paralyzing condition of affairs such as would follow from a strike like this can not as yet be considered a success. A system which does not include every phase of the problem—just compensation to labor, just treatment of the railroads, security and safety and fair returns to the investor—is not a satisfactory system. Labor must be paid; taxes must be met; railroads must operate; and if the system of regulation can not take care of all these things, then something else will come to take its place. If you have not the facts to prove that Government ownership is unwise, it will be seized upon at once as the remedy. If the facts do prove it to be wise, then we want it, for our present condition is next to unbearable.

If we should ever be called upon to meet the situation which we are in a sense anticipative of by reason of the great program of preparedness which is being slowly presented, the first essential of thorough preparedness would be the efficiency of our transportation system; and if that transportation system should be in such a condition at that time that such a situation as is now promised could arise, we would be powerless before the enemy. We would have to do what Germany has done; we would have to do what England did when her ammunition supply began to fail; we would have to do what France has done—that is, put the entire transportation system under the control of the Government, and completely under its control.

I quote now from a newspaper article, which is headed "Chief factors in proposed eight-hour demand on railroads":

> Railroads involved: All roads in the United States and some in Canada.
> Mileage covered: 250,000 miles.
> Unions: Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers, Order of Railway Conductors, Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen.
> Number of men involved: Between 350,000 and 400,000.
> Total wages paid this class of railroad employees, 1914: $386,000,000.
> Total operating revenues of railroads affected, 1914: $3,047,019,008.
> Total operating expenses: $2,200,313,159.
> Total capital securities: $20,247,300,000.
> Proportion of railroad revenues paid to labor, 1914: 45.14 per cent; 1907, 41.42 per cent.
> Proposed demand: "Eight hours or less" to constitute a day instead of "10 hours or less," as present agreements read. All overtime to be paid for at time and one-half the pro rata rate instead of merely the pro rata rate.
> Estimate of railroad managers as to increase this would mean in operating expenses: From 25 to 40 per cent.
> When demand will probably be made: March 1, on conclusion of present referendum vote.

I also quote another article, as follows:

> WHAT RAILROAD MANAGERS SAY OF PROPOSED EIGHT-HOUR DEMAND.
> That it would add millions to their pay rolls.
> That because of wage increases between 1910 and 1914 a total of $250,000,000 was added to their pay rolls for the same number of men.
> That because of wage increases awarded to the four classes involved in the present demand—engineers, firemen, conductors, and trainmen—their earnings have jumped in four years $70,000,000.
> That the proposed schedule would be in effect an increase of 25 per cent in the freight speed basis for wage computing.
> That it would mean an increase of 87½ per cent in the overtime rate.
> That many engineers are now paid more than bank presidents in small communities.
> That more than 1,500,000 other employees would get no benefit.
> That the 600,000 stockholders of the railroads now get less than 2 per cent of the gross earnings.
> That the employees, on the other hand, now get 45 per cent of the gross earnings.
> That the employees involved in this demand, although numbering only 19 per cent of the railroad army, now absorb 28 per cent of the railroads' gigantic pay roll of $1,500,000,000 a year.
> That money to meet this demand could be obtained only by reducing the wages of other employees, reducing payments for interest and dividends, curtailing betterment expenditures demanded by the public, or asking the Government for a proportionate increase in freight rates.

This is a tremendous problem, and, of course, I do not assume at this time to discuss the merits of either side.

I call attention to these facts simply to show something of the nature of the issue which will be involved if such a condition of affairs should arise as is expected in the next two or three months. We will then be face to face with the question whether or not our method and our manner of dealing with the transportation question has such virtue as will enable it, in a successful or effective way, to deal with the problem which will be presented.

The argument upon the other side, with reference to Government ownership, is that under Government ownership that condition of affairs could never happen. I do not say that that statement is based upon sound reasoning or logic, but it is argued by those who are now discussing this very question that the only solution for such a condition of affairs is Government ownership. Whether that is true or untrue, I want the committee which is proposed to be created to ascertain and to report; whether it is wise or unwise, I want the committee's view in regard to that, and that, Mr. President, was the sole purpose and the only purpose I had in offering this amendment, namely, to round out, complete, and make comprehensive and full this proposed investigation, to do precisely what the President says, give every viewpoint which may lead to a successful consideration of that matter.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the Senator, with his usual foresight, has suggested a very important question for the consideration of the Senate, a question which we must meet at some time in the future, but which, in my judgment, should not be covered in the proposed investigation by an instruction of Congress. The language of the resolution is sufficiently broad to cover an inquiry into Government ownership and operation of railroads, and I am sure the committee will listen to any well-considered proposal upon that subject. Such an inquiry, if carried on effectively, would cover a very long period of time and would require a very large expenditure of money. It will require investigation not only at home, but abroad, and particularly in countries where Government ownership has been resorted to; and just now, of course, it would be almost impossible to consider this question on the ground in the principal countries that now have Government ownership, for they are in the throes of war and are in such a state of confusion that it would be utterly impossible for outsiders to obtain access to the proper information or to obtain the proper guides for action.

Whilst I admit that the Government of England is being rapidly socialized, as are the Governments of other nations involved in this war, and that the Democratic socialism of England is engaged in a deadly contest with the autocratic socialism of Germany, the results of which will be most instructive, I think any study at present of these conditions will be fruitless.

The inquiry which the Senator presents not only covers transportation, but also covers telegraphs lines, express companies, and so forth. It is a very broad inquiry. Individually, I have no prejudice against Government ownership. I have a perfectly open mind upon the subject. I am ready at any time to vote for Government ownership where the exigencies of the situation require it. I voted for Government ownership in Alaska, because without it apparently the latent resources of that Territory could not be developed. When it was demonstrated that we could not, through our merchant marine, meet the requirements of foreign commerce in this cataclysm of war, I not only voted for the Government acquisition of ships, but I also went even to the extent—somewhat against my judgment, because I thought it unnecessary at the time—of yielding to insistence for Government operation.

So I have no prejudice whatever against the Senator's proposal; but I do think that just now our inquiry should be confined first to the question of perfection of regulation. I do not believe public regulation has broken down. At all events, it has not sufficiently broken down to warrant us to-day in taking up seriously the question of Government ownership. There must be further developments in the future to force that consideration upon us. Meanwhile it is our duty to perfect Government regulation.

What are the questions which are presenting themselves to us with reference to Government regulation? First, the reorganization and enlargement of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is to-day overburdened. We feel that there should be some provision for enlarging the commission and we shall consider the proposals for dividing it into branches or divisions, which shall sit contemporaneously upon important matters, and thus meet more rapidly the requirements of the business of the country. There is also the question of the organization of these great interstate systems, the question as to whether we shall compel these great systems which embrace numerous States to go to an individual State and give them their choice of such States in perfecting their corporate organization—if we do that they will always go, of course, to the State that has the least restrictions—or whether we shall compel them, or at all events give them the opportunity, to resort to the National Government itself for their charters.

Then there is the question of securities—a most vital question and one that will absorb our interest for some time as to the extent to which the securities issued by railroads shall be controlled by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there for a question?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. When the bill was pending here that had passed the House, and that the Senator himself reported to the Senate, in favor of the regulation of the issuance of those securities, did the Senator then feel that there ought to be more investigation before we passed a law of that kind?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No. I was very much impressed with the importance of legislation on the subject; but I saw——

Mr. NORRIS. Why is it that the Senator has changed his viewpoint?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have already stated that on a previous occasion. The bill was never reported until toward the close of the exhaustive long session in 1914, in which we had been considering most important measures, such as the Trade Commission bill and the Clayton bill, and at a time when Congress was practically exhausted; and it was concluded that that was not the time to take up that matter, because a great and serious difference of opinion had arisen in the committee itself as to the wisdom of the bill which we had theretofore reported, and reported, I think, unanimously. Then came the short session, and there were precipitated upon us all these questions that related not only to the Mexican War but to the European War; and in the short session it was impossible to bring it up for consideration.

Mr. NORRIS. Then the Senator does not expect, even after this investigation is made, that at the next session, which is a short session, any law could be passed regulating the issue of securities?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; I should hope so, and I should hope to be able, possibly, to report a bill regarding securities at this session. I should hope that would be the case.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator expect to do anything of that kind?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I can not say. I should hope to do it. I say we will take up the whole investigation in good faith.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator believe that the joint committee could make any further investigation than the Senate committee and the House committee have already made on that particular point, referring now particularly to stocks and bonds?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am sure deliberation in the committee itself would probably result—I should hope it would result—in our making a practically unanimous recommendation, instead of being divided, as we are now, upon various points.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator's committee was not divided when it reported that bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is true; it was not divided then, but it was divided afterwards, before the bill came up for consideration. Such Senators as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], a Senator whose antagonism to any measure means a fight, and whose ability to conduct a spirited and able fight can not be discounted, were against the bill as reported.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator mean to say that the Senator from Wisconsin had changed from a Senator favoring the bill to one opposing it at that time?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I can not say that, because I do not think the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin was brought very seriously to the consideration of the bill before it was reported. I do not think he participated in the deliberations. My impression is that he was ill at the time, or at all events was not well, and was not attending as closely to committee business as usual.

Mr. President, I am reminded that it is very nearly 2 o'clock. I am very anxious to have a vote upon this subject; and I trust we shall be able to dispose of the joint resolution without placing this amendment upon it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not willing that this amendment should be disposed of in the presence of only 10 or 12 Senators. I ask for a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	Nelson	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Hollis	Newlands	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Hughes	Norris	Smoot
Broussard	Husting	Oliver	Sterling
Bryan	James	Overman	Stone
Catron	Johnson, Me.	Page	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Pittman	Thomas
Clapp	La Follette	Poindexter	Thompson
Clarke, Ark.	Lane	Pomerene	Underwood
Cummins	Lee, Md.	Ransdell	Vardaman
Curtis	Lippitt	Reed	Walsh
du Pont	Lodge	Sheppard	Warren
Gallinger	McCumber	Sherman	Williams
Gronna	McLean	Shields
Harding	Martine, N. J.	Simmons

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to state that the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] is absent on official business.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is necessarily detained by official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending question is the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before a vote is taken on the amendment, I desire to make a change of a word, for the purpose of perfecting the amendment. I ask that the last word, "regulation," be stricken out and the word "operation" inserted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the proposed modification.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Idaho modifies his amendment by striking out the word "regulation," the last word in the amendment, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "operation."

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the amendment as modified be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 13, after the word "commerce," it is proposed to insert:

Also the subject of Government ownership of all public utilities, such as telegraph, telephone, express companies, and railroads engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, and report as to the wisdom or feasibility of Government ownership of such utilities, and as to the comparative worth and efficiency of Government regulation and control, as compared with Government ownership and operation.

Mr. BORAH. On that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. That Senator is unavoidably absent, and for that reason I withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CATRON. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], who is absent. I do not know how he would vote if present. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. HOLLIS. I announce my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] to the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY];

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON];

The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]; and

The junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN].

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—39.

Ashurst	Harding	McCumber	Sherman

So Mr. BORAH's amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 3331.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am sure the Senate is ready to vote now upon the joint resolution, and I will ask the Senator from Tennessee if he will not permit the bill to be temporarily laid aside for that purpose.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will agree that the unfinished business may be laid aside temporarily for a vote upon the joint resolution, with the distinct understanding that there is to be no further debate. Otherwise I can not agree to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. That can not be had.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That can not be had. The joint resolution is as in Committee of the Whole and still open to amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand that there is no disposition to debate it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I object to the unfinished business being laid aside.

Mr. LODGE. I object. Let us have the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection, and the unfinished business is before the Senate.

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. SHIELDS. I ask for action upon the amendments of the Committee on Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 18, line 17, after the word "not," strike out the words "until the time herein fixed for termination."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 18, line 19, after the word "repeal," to strike out the words "and then only" and insert the word "except," so as to make the proviso read:

That in case any grantee hereunder shall, at the time of such alteration, amendment, or repeal, have exercised rights in accordance with this act, such rights and the property used thereunder shall be deemed property rights of such grantee, of which such grantee shall not be deprived by such alteration, amendment, or repeal, except upon the conditions provided in case of termination by section 6 of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). This completes the amendments of the Committee on Commerce. The bill is as in Committee of the Whole and still open to amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I desire to direct the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to the clause at the bottom of page 2 and the top of page 3. I am unable to understand what its significance is or that it has any. First, section 1 of the bill provides:

That the word "persons," as used in this act, shall be construed to mean both the singular and plural, as the case demands, and shall be construed to mean political subdivisions of States, municipal corporations, corporations, companies, and associations; and the term "grantee" herein shall mean any such persons to whom shall be granted a permit as herein provided.

Then follows the language:

Provided, That when the power to be developed by the project and improvement of the stream for navigation is used or to be used for a public-utility purpose or purposes the grantee must be a municipal corporation, or a political subdivision, or other agencies of a State, or a public-service agent of a State, or a public-utility corporation created and organized under the laws of a State or the United States, authorized to engage in the business of furnishing water, heat, or electric energy for public or private use, and whose rates and charges and service shall be subject to regulation by the laws of the State or a duly constituted commission or other agency of said State.

Section 2 provides that the Secretary may grant permits to any of the persons mentioned in section 1. Now, it is provided that when the grant is to be made for public utility purposes it must be made to persons therein designated. Then it is provided by the language to which I am addressing my remarks as follows:

But in any case where the State has not made provision for authorizing municipal organizations, political subdivisions, or other agencies of the State or public utility corporations or agencies to engage in said business—

That is, the business of furnishing water for developing energy for public or private use—the qualifications of the grantee prescribed in this proviso shall not apply.

Mr. President, I imagine that there is no State in the Union whose laws do not permit municipal corporations, political subdivisions, or other agencies of the State, or public utility corporations or agencies to engage in said business. I can not conceive that there is such a State; but if there is a State which denies to all those various classes the right to engage in the business of furnishing water, heat, and power for public and private use, who is there in that kind of a State who may engage in that kind of business? There is not anybody left except private persons. If that is the case, then you certainly do not want that provision in. You, it seems to me, ought not to permit these powers to be acquired for the purpose of generating heat, light, or power to be distributed for private or public use except by a political subdivision of a State or some other agency of a State or by a public-service agent or a public utility corporation. I do not see any purpose to be subserved by that language, and therefore, Mr. President, I move to amend by striking out from the semicolon in line 24, page 2, to the semicolon in line 4, page 3.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to say that there is a very good purpose served by that language. It is possible that there may a situation or condition arise in which there is no subdivision of the State or public-utility company that has authority to develop water power as provided for in the bill, and in that event natural persons ought to be authorized to do so. Natural persons are included in the general definition of persons in the section just above where the lines moved to be stricken out occur.

It is said that there is no State in the Union that does not authorize subdivisions, municipalities, and public-utility corporations to engage in this business. If this is so, as a matter of course this can do no harm; but I understand that there are some States which do not authorize their municipalities or subdivisions to do this, and it is intended to cover every possible case and insure the development of water power for municipal purposes.

This is a section that relates to the development of water power for municipal purposes, and there ought to be no case in which it can not be done. Certainly under the Senator's own statement it can do no harm, and it is evident it may possibly conduce to the development of water power in some cases. I hope the lines will not be stricken out, for it is believed they will subserve a useful purpose in some cases.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to say a word further, Mr. President, with respect to that matter. In a State which authorizes political subdivisions and public-service corporations to engage in this business, and likewise authorizes private persons to engage in this business, you deny by this bill the right of a private person to acquire a permit under the bill; but in a State which does not even exercise so much care in this matter as to require that those who undertake it shall undertake it under the limitations imposed by the law, you give in that State the right for a private person to engage in it. I inquire of the Senator——

Mr. SHIELDS. Do I understand the Senator to mean that if a natural person obtains a permit to engage in the right he is not under the control of the public-service commission of the State?

Mr. WALSH. No; I have not said so, I will say to the Senator from Tennessee. What I say is——

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to say, in furtherance of what I have said on this subject, that if natural persons obtain a permit and make the development in the rates and charges they are to make, they are as much subject to the control of the public-service corporations or the laws of the State where the improvement is located as a corporation. There can be no difference to the consumer in any respect as to who makes the development, whether it is a subdivision of the State or a public-utility corporation or a natural person in that respect. It is only to provide so that there can be a development in every case.

In all cases under the express provision of the act where there is a subdivision of the State or a municipality, which is the same thing, or a public-utility corporation, they have the preference; and it is only in the event that such public-utility companies or subdivisions of the State are not authorized that a person can make the improvement. There is no possibility of any public harm being done them by this provision, and it does provide for cases which may occur.

Mr. WALSH. I am afraid I have not made myself clear to the Senator from Tennessee, because he has not responded at all to any argument I have been making. I directed attention to the fact that in a State which by its laws alike permits a private person to engage in this business and also permits political subdivisions and public-utility corporations, you deny to the private person the opportunity to get a permit under this act, but you permit the private person to get a permit under this act in a State that does not extend that privilege to public-utility corporations and political subdivisions.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish the Senator would point out the language in section 1 of the bill which can be construed in the light he has just stated.

Mr. WALSH. I have pointed it out. It commences at line 24 of page 2 and continues to the semicolon in line 4 of page 3.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not see that if that provision remains in the bill it has the effect the Senator says it will have. I understood the Senator to say if that provision is allowed to remain in the bill there would be cases in which an individual could not make a location and develop water power upon the navigable streams of the country.

Mr. WALSH. No; the Senator misunderstood me.

Mr. SMOOT. That is as I understood the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I said that in States which authorize political subdivisions and public-utility corporations to engage in that business a private person could not secure a permit under this proposed law.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not see that that is the case, Mr. President. This simply states that in a case where the State has not made provision, where there are no municipal corporations, political subdivisions, or public-utility corporations, or other agencies of the State to engage in said business the qualification of the grantee prescribed in this proviso shall not apply; or, in other words——

Mr. WALSH. The Senator may have been misled by what I said. I referred to the language immediately preceding that commencing with the proviso.

Mr. SMOOT. In line 13 of page 2?

Mr. WALSH. Commencing in line 13, down to the place at which the proposed amendment commences, which forbids the granting of a permit to a private person in a State whose laws authorize these corporations and political subdivisions. It denies to a private person in those States the opportunity to get a permit. In other words, in my State, for instance, no private individual could come to the Government here and get a permit to build a dam if he wished to develop power and light.

Mr. SHIELDS. For a public-utility purpose, you mean?

Mr. WALSH. Exactly; but in the State of Utah a private person could come here and get this permit, assuming, for instance, that the State of Utah has not authorized public corporations or a political subdivision to engage in that business. It does, as a matter of fact. I simply use that for the purpose of illustration.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, what the Senator says I believe is true, but it applies only to public utilities. It does not apply to the business of generating electricity for general use.

Mr. WALSH. The language of the bill, I will say to the Senator, is for public or private use.

Mr. SHIELDS. If the Senator will read a little further down, beginning with line 13, he will find the following:

Provided, That when the power to be developed by the project and improvement of the stream for navigation is used or to be used for a public utility purpose or purposes the grantee must be a municipal corporation or a political subdivision or other agencies of a State, or a public-service agent of a State, or a public-utility corporation created and organized under the laws of a State or the United States.

It only gives the preference to those companies where they are authorized to do business, which, I think, is certainly a very wise and wholesome provision.

Mr. WALSH. If it gave only a preference I should not object to it, but I can not conceive that it does. Those are the only persons who can get a permit which will authorize them to go into that business under this act. You deny to the private person in that State the right to get a permit.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, it is the object of the bill to deny to an individual the right to develop a water power for a public utility purpose so long as there is a subdivision of the State or a public-utility company that will enter into the business. I understand it is generally conceded that it is best to put such public-utility work, especially for public-utility purposes, under the control of governmental agencies. That was the object and intention, and I think it is a very sound provision.

Mr. SMOOT. I think without that provision I would be more opposed to the bill than I am. I do believe that that provision ought to be in the bill. I do not believe that private corporations ought to develop a power for public-utility purposes. That is all that this provision prevents. If it were otherwise, a person in a State which has a public-utility organization for the purpose of furnishing power for public-utility purposes could go to work and get a permit under the bill. I do not think that he ought to be allowed to do it as long as there is a public-utility corporation or organization that will do it for the people.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, that is not the question. I fully agree that States ought to pass such laws as that, but that is not the point at all. The point I am making is that you give to a private individual in a certain State the right to go and get a permit and you deny to private persons the right in other States.

Mr. SMOOT. That only applies, does it not, to a State that has not created a public-utilities commission?

Mr. WALSH. No; but I am very sure that that was the idea intended to be expressed here. I dare say that the idea which was in the mind of the man who drafted that portion of the bill was that the provision on page 2 should apply, and that the exception should be the case of a State that did not have a public-utility commission; that in a State that did not have a public-utility commission the grant might be made to one whose acts were not subject to regulation and control by a public-utility commission, as provided at the bottom of page 2. I have no doubt at all that was the idea to be expressed, but I invite your attention to the fact that the language does not express any such idea, because it does not say "Provided, That in the case of any State which does not authorize the regulation and control of rates by a public-service board or a public-utility board this restriction shall not apply"; but it says "Provided, That the restriction shall not apply in the case of a State that does not authorize these political subdivisions or public utilities to engage in the business at all."

So the point raised by the Senator from Utah is not sustained by the language of the bill. The plain meaning of the bill is that in certain States a private individual may come here to the General Government and get a permit which will permit him to engage in the public-utility business in distributing this power for the purpose for hire, and in certain other States a private person can not come here and get the permit, but the permit must be granted to a public-service corporation or a political subdivision.

Mr. SMOOT. It can, however, only apply in a State that has not made provision for authorizing the municipal corporations or political subdivisions, as the case may be, to develop power. The proviso on page 2, beginning in line 13, states:

> That when the power to be developed by the project and improvement of the stream for navigation is used or to be used—> for a public-utility purpose or purposes, the grantee must be a municipal corporation, or a political subdivision, or other agencies of a State, or a public-service agent of a State.

I think the Senator from Montana will agree that that is a wise provision in the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, my State authorizes political subdivisions and also corporations to engage in this business. It also authorizes private persons to engage in it. Now, there is another State that does not authorize anyone but private persons to engage in that business. A private person from my State can not come down here and get a permit although the laws of my State authorize him to engage in that business, but in States that do not authorize political subdivisions, that do not authorize corporations to engage in the business, the private person may come here and get a permit. I want to know whether that is a fair provision in any bill?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator are not municipal corporations, public-utility corporations, or other agencies of the State authorized to engage in such business?

Mr. WALSH. They are in my State, I will say to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Then, this would not affect the Senator's State. His State would be included in the words that precede these. The words stricken out would not affect the Senator's State at all.

Mr. WALSH. No; the words which have been stricken out would not affect my State.

Mr. NELSON. They would not affect the Senator's State. In his State private persons could not get the power, and, therefore, the other requirements in the bill could not possibly affect his State.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but I do not want to have this act deny to a private person in my State the right that it gives to a private person in another State.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me further, I will say that I can hardly conceive of a State where neither a municipal corporation, a political subdivision, a public-utility corporation, nor other agencies of the States would not have such authority. I do not know of a single such State in the Union. There are States which do not have utility commissions; but that does not figure in this case. It is not a question of having a utility commission; it is a question whether these quasi-political bodies exist in any State. I think almost every incorporated city and town has the power to provide light and heat for the municipality. I can scarcely conceive of a single State or Territory in the country where such corporate bodies have not that power.

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that I entertain exactly the same idea, and, therefore, I insisted that this clause had no particular application at all; but I am assured by the Senator from Tennessee that the Senator from Minnesota and I are in error about that, and that there are some States, or there may be some States——

Mr. NELSON. I hardly think there are any such States.

Mr. WALSH. Or there may be some States in which such corporations are not thus authorized.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee has not said that there was a State where the subdivisions of it were not authorized to engage in this business; but it is a fact that there are a large number of municipal corporations in States that are not authorized by their charters to establish a water plant or to construct a water plant or a gas plant, where even a special act of the general assembly of the State is required to authorize them to do so.

The construction of a power plant is not an ordinary municipal purpose. We may find, on investigation, that there are States that have never authorized their municipalities to develop water power for municipal purposes, even though they have the power to construct a gas plant or an electric-light plant, because this goes further than the mere question of a plant for lighting purposes. I know of no such particular State. I have no such corporation in mind; but I do know that there is a great want of uniformity in the charters of municipalities throughout all the States of the Union. I do know that this provides for special State agencies that do not now exist for the development of water power—agencies which the general assemblies of the States could hereafter create.

The first statement of the Senator from Montana was that he knew of no State where the subdivisions or municipalities or public utilities were not authorized to engage in this business. If that be so, this provision is utterly harmless, and will affect no one and no State; but if, on the contrary, it should develop that there are such States, then it provides for a development where otherwise it could not be had.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SHIELDS. I will do so in a moment. The intention and object of this bill is to provide for the development of water power under any and all possible circumstances and to remove the great obstacles that now exist to such development. I now yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I think I agree with what the Senator from Tennessee has just stated; but if the effect of this proviso is that if there is any State which has not made provision for public-utility functions to be exercised by its corporations especially authorized for that purpose, then, under this bill, the Secretary of War may issue a permit to a private person to maintain a dam across a navigable river. That is the trouble, as I view it. If the Senator from Tennessee is certain that every State has made provision for these corporations and municipalities or the other instrumentalities enumerated in this proviso to exercise those functions, then no damage will be done; but if there is any State having a navigable river which has not made such provision—and that is a question of fact—then, under this bill, the Secretary of War may issue a permit to a private person to dam a navigable river.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all there is to it.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, here is an illustration of what may happen——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, may I take a moment just for my own satisfaction and for information?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Does this bill apply only to navigable waters?

Mr. SHIELDS. It does.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Then, I would suggest to the Senator from Montana, if I am not mistaken, that where there are no navigable streams we have a difficulty fully as hard to reach in the matter of water power of nonnavigable streams when we come to consider the bill. If, however, the language applies simply to navigable streams, it would not affect my State, and I do not think it would affect Montana, unless I am mistaken about it.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I will give an illustration where this provision would be necessary. There may be a municipality that desires to develop water power for various public-utility purposes. It may not be authorized by its charter to do so. There are such cases at that. No one will dispute that many municipalities are of limited powers and the powers are always in the discretion of the general assembly creating them, either by general laws or special acts. There being such municipalities desiring to develop the power, or rather the inhabitants of the city desiring to develop a water power for public-utility purposes, and the charter not authorizing it, they would be cut off and deprived of the advantages of such development for the commonest utility purposes. The corporation or municipality not desiring to do so, there may be public-spirited citizens or there may be citizens who desire to do it for a profit. It can be done in that way, when otherwise it would go undeveloped, and the corporation or municipality would go without light or power for other public-utility purposes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHIELDS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee a question. The proviso which is under consideration is to this effect:

Provided, That when the power to be developed by the project and improvement of the stream for navigation is used or to be used for a public-utility purpose or purposes the grantee must be a municipal corporation, or a political subdivision, or other agencies—

I suppose it means "agency"— of a State, or a public-service agent of a State, or a public-utility corporation created and organized under the laws of a State or the United States, authorized to engage in the business of furnishing water, heat, or electric energy for public or private use, and whose rates and charges and service shall be subject to regulation by the laws of the State or a duly constituted commission or other agency of said State.

I presume that the limitation which is made by that proviso was inserted because the committee deemed it important that the right to develop a water power under such circumstances should be limited to a municipal corporation or other agency such as is described in the proviso. I presume there must have been some very strong and controlling reason which induced the committee to put in that limitation. Am I correct about that?

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly. It was intended to give municipalities the preference in developing water power for municipal purposes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Now, I submit to the Senator from Tennessee that, having inserted that proviso upon the theory that it would be unwise to allow others than those named in the proviso to acquire these rights, it is inconsistent thereafter to provide, upon the mere contingency that there does not happen to be such a law in the State, that other persons should be permitted to acquire such rights; in other words, if it is unwise in one State, or if it is unwise in the great majority of States, to extend this right to persons other than those named, then certainly it must be unwise to grant the right in any State, irrespective of its laws. Therefore upon the mere existence of this contingency we are doing what is concededly an unwise thing.

Why would it not be better to eliminate this provision, in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Montana, as I understand, and compel the particular State, if there be any such, that has not made provision in its laws which will enable it to come under the proviso to do so? Is it not better to do that than to write into the law what everybody and what the bill itself concedes is an unwise provision?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I would suggest, if the Senator from Tennessee will permit me, that the bill does not seem to confine the benefits of its operation simply to municipalities, but it gives preference to the subdivisions of powers of a State where the aggregated people want it. I can, however, easily conceive of conditions where in a thickly settled farming community, for instance, it might be very well for them or for one individual to create this power so as to supply their homes very far removed from a city. In that event I should think the bill would be wise to leave the matter open. I merely offer that suggestion in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND].

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My complaint is that the proviso first proceeds on the theory that it is important to limit the classes of persons who may take advantage of that provision of the bill to those that are named, and then permits that important principle to be violated because of the mere accident that some State has failed to provide that any of those classes may be called into existence, or, rather, that any of those classes may operate in the way the proviso points out. My point is that if it is unwise in any case it is unwise in all cases. We ought to have a uniform rule.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the committee in inserting this clause did not proceed upon the theory that it was unwise to allow individuals to develop water power for public-utility purposes, but upon the theory that it was best to give the municipality or other subdivision of the State the preference in all cases. It was to some extent favoring the policy of governmental ownership of public utilities. The intention was to provide that where the inhabitants of a municipality desire to own their own public utility they may do so and have the preference over individuals. While the committee did not deem it unwise that an individual should develop such water power as the bill contemplates they deemed it best that for public-utility purposes the municipality should do so, and they deemed it wise to provide that in case the municipality was not authorized to make the development, then that an individual might make it, so that the public might have the benefit of the natural resource adjacent to the city or town wherever it might be. There was no question of wisdom or unwisdom involved; it was merely a question of giving the public the preference in such matters and of placing in the bill a provision under which in any event the development might be made.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But, Mr. President, the proviso does not give these particular classes the preference. The proviso is exclusive. It says that no others shall enjoy the right except the classes named.

Mr. SHIELDS. It is preferential in effect.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, no, Mr. President; it says——

Mr. SHIELDS. It provides in brief that wherever there is a municipality authorized to make the development, it shall be made by such municipality, and only in case the municipality is not authorized to enter upon the work can an individual do it in any State.

Again, Mr. President, whether or not the States authorize their municipalities or subdivisions to make such improvements or developments is a matter of local and internal policy. They can always cure any deficiency in this respect by proper legislation in each individual State. It is not a matter for Congress to legislate upon. The committee thought that this matter ought to be left open, for each State to settle such questions for its own inhabitants. If any State wishes to extend this power to any municipality that now does not possess it, or if it wishes to create a State agency or to authorize any subdivision by incorporating it to engage in this business it can do so. It is a matter largely of local application.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the language is clearly exclusive. The Senator from Tennessee, I think, will concede that wherever these organizations exist a private citizen will not be permitted to enjoy the rights granted by this bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. It was the intention of the committee to give municipalities a preference in such matters, where the power was to be devoted to public-utility purposes. The committee deemed that wise and best.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And absolutely to exclude private citizens in those cases?

Mr. SHIELDS. Where the municipality is authorized to engage in the business, to exclude private individuals; but if the municipality is unauthorized to engage in it, then the bill proposes to give the privilege to the private citizen, so that the community may not by law be deprived of the benefits of an investment or development of this character.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator seems to me to concede what I say; yet I am not absolutely certain that he does.

Mr. SHIELDS. If the Senator will restate his proposition, I will endeavor to understand him.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The provision in the bill, as it now reads, does absolutely exclude the private citizen from any right under it, does it not?

Mr. SHIELDS. Wherever the municipality has power to make the investment or undertake the development, the citizen is excluded.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then it excludes him absolutely. Now, let me ask the Senator from Tennessee why that provision was inserted; why does the bill exclude a private citizen under such circumstances?

Mr. SHIELDS. Because the committee thought the municipality should have the preference. I am not altogether committed to governmental ownership of public utilities, but in many cases I deem such ownership wise and advisable; and I favor this clause upon the ground that it gives municipalities the preference in such matters. There are many cases in which public ownership of utilities has been of very great benefit to municipalities. This is a natural resource in its infancy, and the object of this bill is to develop it in the interest of the people, in the interest of the consumers; and we did not think there would be any provision more wholesome or more for the benefit of the people than to give them the preferential right to make these developments over individual capital and individual control.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Why would it not be better, Mr. President, for the particular State whose laws may now not come within the provisions of this proviso to adjust its laws rather than to have Congress adjust its laws to meet these different conditions?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, it seems to me that Senators overlook a principle that lies at the root of this matter. While I concede that this question is in a sense largely academic, for I hardly know of a State which has not such municipal or public-utility corporations as are described in this proviso, nevertheless, suppose there were a State in this Union that preferred that the development and utilization of a water power for heat or light should be in the hands of private individuals or private corporations instead of in the hands of such agencies as are described in the proviso, ought we to dictate to that State, and say to it, "Unless you have such agencies as are provided in this bill, unless you believe in public ownership, you can not enjoy this privilege"? It goes right to the root of the power of the States.

The question of what is for the best welfare of the public the Federal Government may look at from one standpoint, the standpoint covered by the first part of this proviso, namely, that the power proposed to be conferred by the bill should only be exercised by a certain class of municipal or public-utility corporations, but the State may look upon that question in a different light. A State may say, "We prefer that public-utility services, such as furnishing heat, water, and light, shall not be owned and run by municipalities; we do not believe in that policy; we prefer that they should be run by private corporations or private individuals." In that case, if a State does prefer that order of things, why should we dictate to it a different policy? If there are any States that hold that view—and I doubt whether there are any such States in the Union—but if there are any that prefer that policy, why should we dictate by this bill a different policy?

It is a question of utilizing water power. The justification for this bill is that the water powers proposed to be developed shall be developed for the purpose of improving navigation, and that the furnishing of heat and light is merely an incident to such an improvement. If in a given State they prefer that those incidents shall be utilized for the public benefit through a private corporation and they are opposed to what is called public ownership, why should we dictate to them?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it seems to me that there is some confusion of thought with respect to the latter part of section 1. I may not be able to clear it up, for I confess that there are certain phrases in it that I can not understand; but, referring, in the first place, to the proviso, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] says that it is intended to give the municipal corporation a preference. I can not think that he is accurate in that statement. It does not give the municipal corporation any preference. The public-utility corporation stands upon exactly the same footing as the municipal corporation. A public-utility corporation, as I understand, is a mere private corporation engaged in such a business that it is affected with a public interest.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have not said a public-utility company could not enjoy the privilege conferred. It is expressly written in the bill that a public-utility company may have the same preference as the municipal corporation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. SHIELDS. It is classed along with municipalities.

Mr. CUMMINS. In answering the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], I understood the Senator from Tennessee to say that the municipal corporation or a political corporation of some sort had a preference. It has not.

Mr. SHIELDS. I certainly did not intend to change the language of the bill. Perhaps I used an inaccurate expression, due to the fact that I did not desire to repeat all the language of the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I simply wanted to get my own bearings to find out what is really proposed in the section. The political corporation and the private corporation—I mean the private corporation engaged in a public business—stand upon exactly the same footing, so far as opportunity to secure a permit is concerned; but it will be observed that the individual is entirely eliminated in the proviso of the first section. I am not now considering those States which are excepted in the further provision, but the intention of the proviso is to entirely eliminate the private citizen.

It seems to be conceded that that is wise. I do not concede it; I think it is very unwise. The private citizen engaged in a public business is just as much affected with the public interest as a private corporation engaged in such a business. The municipality and the State can regulate him and regulate his business just as completely as they can regulate the corporation engaged in the same business.

In the State in which I live the municipality may grant a franchise, with the assent or approval of the people, to an individual to own and operate a gas plant, or a water-works plant, or an electric light and power plant; but the individual, once having received the franchise, is just as amenable to the laws as is the private corporation. Does the Senator from Tennessee intend to say to all the municipalities of Iowa that they can not grant a franchise in connection with a water power for the conduct of business of this sort? If he intends to deny the individual who under our law has the right to receive a franchise, what public purpose is conserved or maintained? The private corporation is simply an association of persons, with oftentimes a less liability than the individual himself; and I should be very sorry to see a provision enacted here that would prevent either my State or any other State from carrying forward the public utilities through any agency that it may see fit to select.

That is my objection to the proviso as I find it. I think there is a good deal of obscurity—and I suggest this now to the Senator from Tennessee—about the exception from the proviso. It reads:

> But in any case where the State has not made provision for authorizing municipal corporations, political subdivisions, or other agencies of the State or public utility corporations or agencies to engage in said business—

I have doubt about two things there. First, what does the word "agencies" mean? It can not mean agencies of the State, because that is prescribed in the previous line. It must mean a private or quasi-private agency which the laws of the State authorize to carry out some design of the State or need of the people. What do the words "said business" mean? Do they mean the general public utility business or do they mean that the corporation, whether political or private, is engaged in this particular venture?

I do not know, from either the langugage itself or its context, to what reference is made there—> authorizing municipal corporations, political subdivisions, or other agencies of the State or public utility corporations or agencies to engage in said business.

I ask whether that is meant to apply to a case like this, namely, where it is sought to engage in the business at a particular place at which the permit is asked, or whether it means an agency engaged generally in the public utility business? Those words are rather important, because there are some corporations that have rather a wide interest in this matter and that are engaged in the public utility business in a great many localities and in a great many States as well.

I have not been able to reach a satisfactory conclusion with regard to the meaning of those words. I agree with the Senator from Utah with regard to the exception from the proviso; but I shall insist at the proper time that the proviso itself shall not exclude a private individual who is authorized by his State, either directly or through a municipality of the State, to furnish the people of the locality with heat, power, or light.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the same idea was expressed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], and I think he has very clearly stated the principle that ought to govern us here. I think we may with perfect propriety leave it to each State to say who shall and who shall not engage in business of this character; that is to say, the business of providing heat, light, and power for private or public use. That will be accomplished by striking out everything including and after the word "Provided" on page 2, so that the bill will read:

That the United States hereby authorizes any of the persons as hereinafter defined, after obtaining the permit of the Secretary of War as hereinafter provided, to construct, maintain, and operate a dam or dams or diversion structures and accessory works for the development and improvement of navigation and for water power or other purposes across, in, or along any of the navigable waters of the United States; and such grantee and such permit shall at all times be subject to the provisions of this act and also subject to such conditions as the Secretary of War shall, in accordance with the provisions of this act, make a part of such permit; that the word "persons," as used in this act, shall be construed to mean both the singular and plural as the case demands, and shall be construed to mean political subdivisions of States, municipal corporations, corporations, companies, and associations; and the term "grantee" herein shall mean any such persons to whom shall be granted a permit as herein provided.

That would give everybody a right to come here to the General Government and get a permit to erect a dam. It would give a municipal subdivision, it would give a public-service corporation, it would give any kind of a corporation the power to come here and get a permit. Then, whether that company or the individual, as the case might be, could engage in that particular business, would be determined by the law of the State.

I see no reason why we should undertake to regulate that matter at all, and I think the real change which should be made in the bill is to strike out the entire proviso; but I presented this matter in such a way as to enforce as emphatically as I could the idea that you were giving to individuals in one State privileges which you denied to individuals in another State.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the proposition of the Senator is to deprive municipalities of a preference to construct, develop, and operate their own public-utility companies. That is the substance of it. Begining where he left off, I proceed to read:

Provided, That when the power to be developed by the project and improvement of the stream for navigation is used or to be used for a public utility purpose or purposes the grantee must be a municipal corporation, or a political subdivision, or other agencies of a State, or a public-service agent of a State, or a public-utility corporation created and organized under the laws of a State or the United States, authorized to engage in the business of furnishing water, heat, or electric energy for public or private use, and whose rates and charges and service shall be subject to regulation by the laws of the State or a duly constituted commission or other agency of said State.

It is difficult for me to see why that is not a very wholesome provision in this bill. The Senator says he wants it so that anyone can come here and get a permit in any stream on an equality with the municipalities—with the people, I will say—of the particular community or vicinity where this great natural resource may exist. The very object of this provision is to prevent such a thing as that. It is to give a preference to communities, to the people, in the development, and in the use of the natural resources of the country adjacent to the city or municipality. Why, sir, it is in effect a provision to prevent the water powers of this country from being monopolized by individuals and the people being deprived of their benefits. I am astonished with the view the Senator entertains, that we ought to strike out a provision for such a beneficent purpose as that.

I think the wisdom of this provision must appear from a mere reading of it. As the President says that he can not think there is a State in the Union that does not authorize its municipalities to engage in this business, it certainly can do no harm. I think cases do exist where the municipalities have not the power, and so thought the committee; and therefore we put in this provision, so as not to exclude the development of water power in any case.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then, Mr. President, instead of giving these organizations an exclusive right and absolutely excluding the citizen, why does not the Senator from Tennessee provide that the Secretary of War shall prefer the municipal corporation or the State agency over the private corporation or the citizen in granting these privileges or rights?

The difficulty is that the Senator's proviso does a good deal more than give these agencies a preferential right. It absolutely excludes the individual whenever these agencies exist.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, this bill has been in the hands of a committee of the Senate for practically four years. This bill, practically without change, was reported upon unanimously by the Committee on Commerce, and was on the calendar of the Senate during the last Congress. The committee, if the Senate will allow me so to express it, has built up and torn down and built up again and torn down this proposition, with the purpose and thought that it might perfect, as nearly as a bill of this character can be perfected, a measure that would meet the expectations of the country.

When the committee in charge of this bill commenced its consideration, it had in view three purposes. The first was properly to protect and promote the interests of the people of this country and the users of hydroelectric power. Second, it endeavored to protect as far as possible the interests and rights of the States. Third, it endeavored to take care of the interests of the General Government, and to provide as far as possible for the improvement of its navigable rivers.

As I said in the beginning, in so far as the committee was able to do so, this bill has been carefully prepared. I might say that the principle of the section now under discussion runs through the whole measure. While, of course, I do not object to amending the bill—if an amendment is proposed that improves its provisions and its operation, that is proper and necessary—yet if we are to amend the bill in important particulars without knowing what the effect of the amendment is to be upon other important sections of the bill, we will practically destroy it in the end.

If we can not frame here a bill that will do the things I have suggested—protect the interests of the people of the States and of the Government, provide for navigation, and at the same time put into the bill provisions that will be inviting to capital, that will induce capital to invest its money in the development of these power sites on navigable rivers—we had just as well stop now. We have had that character of legislation on the books for 10 years, and what has been accomplished under it? Not a single, solitary development that I am aware of has been commenced and completed under what is known as the general dam law now on the statute books, and it is my deliberate judgment that none ever will be. So that if Congress is willing, if Congress has reached the conclusion that these great natural resources should be utilized, and in their utilization that the navigation of our rivers should be improved, we have an opportunity to do it here in this bill and at the same time protect the interests of the people and the States and the National Government.

My belief is that the amendment suggested by the Senator from Montana is a dangerous one. My belief is that it will practically destroy the purpose of the bill. I can not understand how the Senator from Montana would prefer that a private interest or private corporation should be permitted to go and improve these rivers and create power in preference to a municipality that desired to do it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Montana has no such purpose.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then I must confess that I have failed to understand the suggestion of the Senator from Montana. Why should not cities, corporations of that character, municipalities, be given the preference when they come to develop these powers for their own particular use? Why should an individual be permitted to go to my town, for instance, and say, "I am going to get a permit, and I am going to build here a power plant and develop hydroelectric power, and I am going to furnish this town with light and heat by electricity," as against the desires of that municipality to do it itself? Why should that be done? Why should not the municipality have the preference?

There is nothing in this bill that prevents an individual or corporation from doing these things where the municipalities themselves do not do them, or do not care to do them, or do not want to do them, or do not expect to do them. That is the view I have of the matter.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, could an individual put a dam in a stream and furnish a city or its citizens with light and heat without the consent of the city?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The city would not be compelled to buy it; that is true.

Mr. CUMMINS. Could the individual do it without the consent of the city in some form or other, through its council or its people?

Mr. BANKHEAD. He might go there, under the contention of the Senator from Montana, and build a dam, if he could get permission from Congress to do it, and prohibit anybody else from doing it.

Mr. CUMMINS. But he could not furnish the people there with heat and light and power without their consent.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, no; not without their consent. Of course, he could not.

Mr. CUMMINS. Just one more question: Does the Senator know of any State in the Union that does not authorize some agency, either individual or corporation, to engage in the business of furnishing heat, light, and power?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; I do not think I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then you absolutely destroy the first provision by the insertion of the last.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, I do not think so at all, Mr. President.

Mr. CUMMINS. Why, it says that the first provision shall not apply if the State has not so authorized such an agency. That is to say, if any State has not authorized any agency—individual, corporate, or in any other form—to supply its people with heat, light, and power, then the first provision disappears entirely.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The bill simply provides that they shall have the preference; they shall have the choice.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. May I ask the Senator, before he takes his seat, whether I understood him correctly? Did I understand the Senator to say that there was nothing in the bill which would prevent an individual from acquiring these rights if the municipal corporation and other agencies named did not exercise them?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; I do not think I said that, exactly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Perhaps I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It may be a corporation or an individual. It does not have to be an individual necessarily. It might be a corporation, an incorporated company.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My understanding of this proviso is that if the municipal corporation or other agency named here exists in the State and is given power under the State law to do the things mentioned, then the individual is absolutely excluded. In other words, a condition might arise where no municipal corporation and no other agency would care to take hold of a particular enterprise, and yet the individual would be excluded from taking hold of the matter because of the very existence of these agencies.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not think that is probable.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is the plain language of it. It says that when the power to be developed by the project, the improvement of the stream for navigation, is used or to be used for a public-utility purpose or purposes, the grantee must be a municipal corporation, and so on. The grantee can not be, under those terms, anything else but one of these agencies that is named. You have absolutely excluded the individual from taking advantage of this law, if I understand it, if these agencies have an existence and have conferred upon them by law the powers which are mentioned.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I do not desire to say anything further in relation to this amendment. I have said all that in my judgment need be said, and my views with respect to it can not possibly be misunderstood. I arise, however, to say a word now by reason of some of the remarks of the distinguished Senator from the State of Alabama, which might lead an uninformed reader of the RECORD to put me in the attitude of an opponent of this measure.

The Senator from Alabama, I know, does not entertain that idea, because he has abundant reason for knowing that there is no Senator who is more sincerely desirous than myself of seeing this bill passed in perfected form. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] discharged a very high duty and performed a very distinguished service to the country, in my estimation, in his impressive speech the other day concerning the overwhelming importance of this measure. It is my own conviction that this bill and the accompanying bill, which I trust will be considered as soon as this is disposed of, concerning the disposition of power sites upon the public domain, are fraught with more significance, so far as the future development and prosperity of this country are concerned, than any other measure that can possibly engage the attention of this body during the present session. I do not even except the so-called preparedness measures. And, Mr. President, I might add to what was said in that behalf by the Senator from Tennessee the other day that it has been estimated, and I think with accuracy, that we are consuming in this country coal to the amount of $1,000,000 per day for the generation of power that might just as well and better be developed by the falling waters of our streams. That signifies an annual loss of $300,000,000 to this country by reason of the fact that its water-power resources are not developed. If you capitalize that at 5 or 6 per cent interest, the figures grow so vast that the human mind, with all its capacity, is incapable of comprehending their full significance.

Mr. President, my own State leads the Union in its development of water power per capita. There is more developed water power per capita in the State of Montana than in any other State in the Union. It is one of the first in its total capacity, aggregating, according to careful estimates, about 5,000,000 horsepower. The development to date is in the neighborhood of 250,000 horsepower, and development is going on to-day in my State more largely than in any other State in the Union.

Some of the remarks of the esteemed Senator from the State of Arizona [Mr. SMITH] might be interpreted to mean that my interest in the bill was quite unnecessary, because it in no wise affected my State. The esteemed Senator is quite in error about that. The Missouri River in the State of Montana is navigable for upward of 300 miles. The Yellowstone River in the State of Montana is navigable for upward of 200 miles. The Kootenay River in the State of Montana is navigated for a distance of nearly 100 miles, and into the British possessions traffic is actually carried on for nearly as much more. So while we are deeply interested in the other bill—the power-site bill—the one that is before us now is not without vast significance and importance to the development of industry in the State which I have the honor in part to represent.

Now, the Senator from Alabama does understand, and everyone else ought to understand, that I am here to assist in the passage of this bill, but anyone will make a mistake if he assumes that because of my intense interest in the enactment of legislation upon this subject I shall not feel at liberty at any time to call attention to those features of the bill which seem to me to require change. And indeed, Mr. President, I do so because of my firm conviction that this bill, unless it is radically amended, will never receive the President's approval. So I am exceedingly desirous to put it in the most unexceptionable shape.

Mr. President, while I am talking about that I might as well say what I intended to say a little later in connection with some other amendment that I desire to present. The subject will be reached after another amendment is offered. We ought to recognize in the consideration of this measure that we have been at a deadlock upon this proposition for a period of upward of eight years. During that time, as has been told you by the Senator from Alabama, development has practically been arrested because the existing laws are impossible. They do not offer the inducements and the encouragements to capital that are absolutely essential in order that it should engage in this particular line of enterprise.

The situation became acute when the so-called Rainy River dam bill was vetoed by President Roosevelt in the year 1908. I have here a copy of that veto message, and I am going to send it to the desk to be read by the Secretary in order that we may have clearly before us the nature of the opposition which was made at that time to the bill then under consideration and the features which the then President of the United States deemed ought to be incorporated in a bill of this character.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

VETO MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT.

The Speaker laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without my approval, House bill 15444, to extend the time for the construction of a dam across Rainy River.

This bill is returned for several reasons, some of which are general, others special. In this particular case permission to construct this dam was originally given, as being in Rainy Lake River, by the act of May 4, 1898 (30 Stat., 398), which limited the time for commencing the work to one year and for completing it to three years from that date. Further extensions of time were granted as follows: For commencement, three years, and for completion, five years from May 4, 1900, by the act of that date (31 Stat., 167); for construction until May 4, 1907, by the act of June 28, 1902 (32 Stat., 485); for completion until July 1, 1908, by the act of February 25, 1905 (33 Stat., 814). The act of 1905 substituted the Rainy River Improvement Co. for the original permittee. All rights given by these acts will expire July 1, 1908, unless the dam is completed on or before that date. In other words, the permittees will then have enjoyed for more than 10 years the exclusive privilege of constructing this work, and have apparently failed to take advantage of it, for this bill would extend the time for three years longer to some unnamed day in July, 1911.

I do not believe that natural resources should be granted and held in an undeveloped condition either for speculative or other reasons. So far as I am aware, there are no assurances that the grantees are in any better condition promptly and properly to utilize this opportunity than they were at the time of the original act, 10 years ago.

In all permits of this character the duty of declaring a forfeiture, after notice and hearing, for failure to begin or complete construction within the time limited by the permit, or for other breach of conditions, should be definitely imposed upon the proper administrative officer (in this case the Secretary of War). There have been many unfortunate experiences resulting from conditional grants, which, though on their face apparently terminable for breach of condition, proved practically indeterminate because no one official was specifically given power to discover and declare the breach. The general statute regulating dams in navigable waters (act June 21, 1906, 34 Stat., 386), though representing an advance, yet leaves uncertain much that should be definitely expressed in each act permitting the construction of dams under this statute.

A definite time limit is one of these important omissions. The public must retain the control of the great waterways. It is essential that any permit to obtsruct them for reasons and on condiions that seem good at the moment should be subject to revision when changed conditions demand. The right reserved by Congress to alter, amend, or repeal is based on this principle; but actual experience of what happens with indeterminate public-utility franchises proves that they are in the vast majority of cases practically perpetual. Each right should be issued to expire on a specified day without further legislative, administrative, or judicial action.

Every permit to construct a dam on a navigable stream should specifically recognize the right of the Government to fix a term for its duration and to impose such charge or charges as may be deemed necessary to protect the present and future interests of the United States in accordance with the act of June 21, 1906. There is sharp conflict of judgment as to whether this general act empowers the War Department to fix a charge and set a time limit. All grounds for such doubt should be removed henceforth by the insertion in every act granting such a permit of words adequate to show that a time limit and a charge to be paid to the Government are among the interests of the United States which should be protected through conditions and stipulations to be imposed either by the War Department or, as I think would be preferable, by the Interior Department.

The provision for a charge is of vital importance. The navigability of every inland waterway, and of all connected and connectible inland waterways as a whole, should be improved for the purposes of interstate and foreign commerce upon a consistent unified plan by which each part should be made to help every other part. One means available for the improvement of navigation at a particular point on any river may be a dam creating a slack-water pool of sufficient depth. Such a dam may, in many cases, develop power of sufficient value to pay in whole or in part for the improvement of navigation at that point, and if there is any surplus it can be spent upon improvements at other points in accordance with the general plan. Since the Government can do by any proper agency what it can do directly, it is in principle immaterial whether this income to construct needed improvements is derived from works constructed directly by the Government or by a corporation acting under Federal authority, since Federal authority is the one indispensable legal prerequisite for the work, though the charge to be paid to the Government for the power would, of course, differ in the two cases; indeed the charge would necessarily vary greatly, for where the improvement was both costly and of great benefit to the public, the charge would naturally be made low and the time limit long.

The income derivable from this source would materially aid in the complete improvement of our navigable waters, for which there is now such crying need. The Chief of Engineers of the Army reports that the bills pending at this session of Congress permit the construction of dams in navigable streams capable of developing over 1,300,000 horsepower. These rivers run every hour in the day and every day in the year. To develop this amount of power would, under average conditions, require about 25,000,000 tons of medium-quality coal every year. This natural wealth is the heritage of the people. I see no reason for giving it away, though there is every reason for not imposing conditions so burdensome as to prevent the utilization of the power. The authority to make, modify, or withhold grants manifestly implies both the power of inquiring into the grounds on which the grants are asked and the duty of administering the grants in the public interest.

We are now at the beginning of great development in water power. Its use through electrical transmission is entering more and more largely into every element of the daily life of the people. Already the evils of monopoly are becoming manifest; already the experience of the past shows the necessity of caution in making unrestricted grants of this great power.

The present policy pursued in making these grants is unwise in giving away the property of the people in the flowing waters to individuals or organizations practically unknown and granting in perpetuity these valuable privileges in advance of the formulation of definite plans as to their use. In some cases the grantees apparently have little or no financial or other ability to utilize the gift, and have sought it merely because it could be had for the asking.

In place of the present haphazard policy of permanently alienating valuable public property we should substitute a definite policy along the following lines:

First. There should be a limited or carefully guarded grant in the nature of an option or opportunity afforded within reasonable time for development of plans and for execution of the project.

Second. Such a grant of concession should be accompanied in the act making the grant by a provision expressly making it the duty of the designated official to annul the grant if the work is not begun or plans are not carried out in accordance with the authority granted.

Third. It should also be the duty of some designated official to see to it that in approving the plans the maximum development of the navigation and power is assured, or at least that in making the plans these may not be so developed as ultimately to interfere with the better utilization of the water or complete development of the power.

Fourth. There should be a license fee or charge which, though small or normal at the outset, can in the future be adjusted so as to secure a control in the interest of the public.

Fifth. Provision should be made for the termination of the grant or privilege at a definite time, leaving to future generations the power or authority to renew or extend the concession in accordance with the conditions which may prevail at that time.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 13, 1908.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to give the subsequent history of that matter?

Mr. WALSH. I should be very glad; but if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. NELSON. I am familiar with it.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator will pardon me first, however. I wanted to put in the veto message of President Taft for the purpose of calling attention to the grounds of objection that had been made to these bills in the past that we may proceed to consider the present legislation in the light of it, and I will be glad then to yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. Very well.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator should have stated that the Rainey River bill was passed over the veto of the President.

Mr. NELSON. I wanted to explain what became of the Rainey River bill, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. WALSH. Very well; I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. The facts of the case were that the parties interested in that grant saw the President and the Secretary of War. The President insisted on certain conditions and changes and compelled them to agree in writing in some form, I do not recall exactly in what form, to accept certain modifications and changes in respect to the rights under the law. That was filed with the Secretary of War, and after that President Roosevelt declared himself satisfied. Word was sent up here that we might pass the bill over his veto. When the bill came back from the House I called the attention of the Senate to the facts in the case, and the Rainey River bill was passed here in the Senate unanimously over his veto. Just what papers were filed in the War Department by the company in connection with that matter I am unable at this moment to specify, but I recall that the bill was passed by the consent of President Roosevelt over his veto in both Houses. In the Senate it was passed unanimously and in the House, I think, there were only two or three votes against it.

Mr. WALSH. I am thankful to the Senator for his information, which I think is accurate.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will yield, I think, in connection with the statement of the Senator from Minnesota, while his statement, I think, is perfectly accurate, the fact ought to be emphasized that the bill was passed over President Roosevelt's veto because the objections that the President set out in his message had been fully met by those interested. He let that be known, I think, through a letter to the Secretary of War or some other Cabinet officer. It was read at least on the floor of the House, showing that they had complied with all the objections the President had set forth in some sort of an agreement. So the action of the Senate and the House must not be taken as in any way contrary to the view set forth by the President in his veto message.

Mr. WALSH. I ask that the veto message of President Taft be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate:

I return herewith, without my approval, Senate bill No. 7343, "to authorize the building of a dam across the Coosa River, Ala., at the place selected for Lock No. 18 on said river."

This bill presents a typical case of a river where its development by the Federal Government for navigation should go hand in hand with its development for water power. The reports of the engineers show that comprehensive plans have been made by the Corps of Engineers for the development of navigation on this river by a series of dams constructed for the purpose of creating deep pools. This bill seeks to authorize the construction of one of these dams through a private agency, the Alabama Power Co., which intends to use the water power created for commercial purposes. If the Federal Government chose to build this dam itself in aid of navigation, its right to the water power incidentally created by the dam would be beyond question. When, instead of building the dam itself, it builds it by an agent, as proposed by this bill, I believe it to be equally clear that the dam and all its incidents, including the water power created, is within the regulative power of the Federal Government in respect to navigation.

It is said that the grantee, the Alabama Power Co., proposes to spend over a million dollars in the construction of a dam, as well as to furnish toward the project its riparian rights and to stand the expense and cost of the damages by flowage. It is manifestly entitled to be credited for all these expenditures, and is manifestly entitled to a fair, full, and reasonable profit for its investment and work. But after all of these items are fully allowed for it is equally manifest that in the course of time the return from the privilege thus granted in the shape of valuable water power created may far exceed a reasonable return for these items.

No provision is made in the bill whereby the Secretary of War may, in granting the permit, exact such compensation as in the course of time may prove to be necessary to equalize this account. I think this is a fatal defect in the bill, and that it is just as improvident to grant this permit without such a reservation as it would be to throw away any other asset of the Government. To make such a reservation is not depriving the States of anything that belongs to them. On the contrary, in the report of the Secretary of War it is recommended that all compensation for similar privileges should be applied strictly to the improvement of navigation in the respective streams—a strictly Federal function. The Federal Government by availing itself of this right may in time greatly reduce the swollen expenditures for river improvements which now fall wholly upon the general taxpayer. I deem it highly important that the Nation should adopt a consistent and harmonious policy of treatment of these water-power projects which will preserve for this purpose their value to the Government whose right it is to grant the permit. The necessity for the adoption of such a policy has recently been pointed out, with my approval, by the Secretary of War, and I see no reason why this bill should be exempted from the safeguards which have been recommended by him in the cases of other bills now pending before Congress.

I therefore return the bill to your honorable body without my approval.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 24, 1912.

[S. 7343. Sixty-second Congress of the United States of America; at the second session, begun and held at the city of Washington on Monday, the fourth day of December, one thousand nine hundred and eleven.]

An act to authorize the building of a dam across the Coosa River, in Alabama, at a place suitable to the interest of navigation about 7½ miles above the city of Wetumpka.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Alabama Power Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Alabama, its successors and assigns, are authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a dam across Coosa River, in the State of Alabama, at a place suitable to the interest of navigation about 7½ miles above the city of Wetumpka, in accordance with the provisions of the act approved June 23, 1910, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters,' approved June 21, 1906."

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
J. H. GALLINGER,
President of the Senate pro tempore.

I certify that this act originated in the Senate.

CHAS. G. BENNETT,
Secretary.
By H. M. ROSE,
Assistant Secretary.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Montana had that veto message read. The Senate will remember doubtless that we passed a bill authorizing the construction of a power dam in connection with the navigation of the Coosa River. What was the effect of that veto message? The company had filed their plans and specifications with the Secretary of War, which had been approved, for a power dam in connection with navigation at Lock 18 on the Coosa River. The Senate passed the bill by a very large majority, and so did the House. President Taft vetoed it. When I learned that the President was considering the veto of that bill I called upon him at the White House to remonstrate with him and remind him that the principles embodied in the bill were exactly those that he had always advocated in orders and otherwise while he was Secretary of War. He said to me "That is true; those were my views then, and they are my views now."

I said, "Mr. President, why are you thinking of this veto?" He said to me, "Senator, I have a Bull Moose Secretary of War; he insists upon this veto along the lines of a veto message that I have authorized him to write." I said, "That is very strange, Mr. President." "Well," he said, "it is. I have not changed my opinions upon the same, but I am too near the end of my administration to have a family row." That is exactly what occurred.

But, Mr. President, that is not all. This company had filed their plans and specifications and had their capital all in bank for the purpose of building this dam to develop power and navigation when the veto message came. What happened? They simply said, "If the people of Alabama and of this country do not desire their rivers improved"—and they proposed to improve 40 miles of nonnavigable river, as it is now—"and if they do not want this investment for the purpose of manufacturing nitrogen and making fertilizers and erecting electric steel furnaces here, we will go where the people do want it." They pulled up and went to Canada, across the river, and they are there now operating that plant from power from Niagara Falls. They have invested millions of dollars there. They are manufacturing hundreds and thousands of tons of nitrogen and other fertilizing articles.

What else? We are buying it from Canada, shipping it back to the cotton fields and cornfields of the South, paying large prices there, and paying freight upon it, when we could have had it right in the midst of our cotton and corn fields had not that veto message been written. That is the history of that transaction.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I did not have the veto messages read, as I gather some Senators believe I did, because I either approve them as a whole or approve of the grounds upon which they were based. My purpose in having the veto messages read at this time was that we might proceed with the consideration of this bill in the light of the objections which have been made to legislation of this character heretofore, and so that we could have in mind how far the present bill will meet those objections and in what respect we are still at variance with the views which were then expressed by the Chief Executive of the Government.

Mr. President, you will observe that the messages refer to the fact that theretofore it was quite customary to grant permits for the construction of dams across navigable streams in perpetuity, and it was urged that that was a mistaken policy. In the year 1890 Congress passed an act authorizing a dam on the Missouri River opposite my home in the State of Montana, a distance of about 15 miles from where I live. That dam exists in the river there now. It is developing power which is transmitted a distance of upward of 200 miles. It exists there under the protection and by virtue of that act, and it is a perpetuity; the parties hold the right forever. It was suggested that that was an unwise policy.

Second, it was suggested, as you will observe by the messages, that these grants had been made without any return whatever to the Government for the privilege which was extended by them. It was urged that all these acts ought to contain a provision by which something should be returned to the Government to be used for the further development of the stream in which the dam is erected. This bill refuses to recognize that principle, and it is with reference to that that I desire to speak particularly, but not at this time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, if the Senator from Montana will kindly permit me, I should like to ask him at this juncture whether he is in favor of the principles and policies enunciated in those messages which have just been read; that is, if he believes the Government of the United States ought to charge a royalty or levy a tax upon these power plants?

Mr. WALSH. I shall propose an amendment, under the provisions of which the Secretary of War will be permitted to put a provision in each permit by which the permittee will be required to pay something for the privilege which he exercises, the moneys derived from that to go into a fund for the improvement of the river.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I thought that was the direction in which the Senator was traveling.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator has been quite accurate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What privilege does the Senator refer to, the privilege to develop water power?

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir; the privilege of damming a stream for the development of water power.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then the Senator proposes to permit the United States Government to impose a tax upon the grantee for the permission to develop a water power, I understand. Am I correct about that?

Mr. WALSH. The Senator can assign whatever consideration he chooses. I shall tender an amendment under the provisions of which the Secretary of War will be authorized to provide in the permit for the payment of an annual charge by the permittee.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. For myself I will express the hope that if that amendment is adopted the bill itself will fail, because I think it is a power which the Government of the United States does not possess and ought not to possess. I think that the only authority which the Government of the United States has in the premises is to protect the navigability of a stream, and if that question were not involved it would have no authority to say anything about the construction of a dam. The development of water power is a matter, in my judgment, wholly under the control of the State, and for one I shall never consent to any other principle going into the bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to say that I think the whole committee so far as I have had an expression are in entire accord with the views expressed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. I certainly can say for myself that I do not think the United States has the slightest proprietary interest in the beds of the navigable streams of this country. Having no interest in it it has no right to sell it or to charge for it. The sole right is that of regulating navigation under the commerce clause.

But, Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Montana will offer an amendment on that subject at a later stage in the consideration of this bill, and it will perhaps save time and we can make more progress to defer the argument on that question until we reach that amendment.

Mr. WALSH. It was the suggestion of the Senator from Montana that we defer a discussion of the question.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to say to the Senator from Montana that in our discussion of this matter I have become thoroughly convinced that he does favor legislation of the kind proposed by this bill in order to develop navigation in streams that Congress now, for want of means, will not improve and in order to develop the power that is so much needed in this country and is now going to waste in them. I have fully believed and yet believe that he has those views and desires to forward legislation of that kind. But if he does agree with and intends to support and to engraft upon this legislation the principles and views expressed by two Executives in the vetoes that he has had read, then he will accomplish nothing. Those views expressed by President Roosevelt in his veto message on the Rainey River bill and which was followed by President Taft in the subsequent veto of the Coosa project were placed in the act of 1910. That is the reason why since that day we have had no development of power in our navigable streams. If those views are to be incorporated in this bill, then it might as well be withdrawn. It would be simply repeating laws that are already on the statute books that have worked so disastrously and have defeated and will continue to defeat development so long as they are the laws of the country.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I merely desire to say that I think the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] will hardly agree with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] that those principles are found in the act of 1910. I have myself been unable to discover them there, but I said that I should, when I offered the amendment, discuss the reasons which impelled me to support the amendment. As to the matter of power, I shall content myself with setting forth my reasons for believing—and I entertain no hesitancy in the belief at all—that the question of power is not a debatable one and that beyond question it exists.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	Norris	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	Hollis	Oliver	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Husting	Overman	Smoot
Broussard	Johnson, Me.	Page	Stone
Catron	Johnson, S. Dak.	Phelan	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Jones	Pittman	Swanson
Cummins	Kenyon	Reed	Thomas
Curtis	Lane	Robinson	Underwood
du Pont	Lodge	Shafroth	Vardaman
Fletcher	McLean	Sheppard	Walsh
Gallinger	Martin, Va.	Sherman	Warren
Gronna	Martine, N. J.	Shields	Weeks
Harding	Nelson	Simmons

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND].

Mr. STONE. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I do not wish to discuss in further detail the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana, to strike out certain provisions on pages 1 and 2 of the bill, but will merely say that the provision which it is now proposed to strike out was very thoroughly considered by the subcommittee and by the whole committee, as was the entire bill. It was deemed by them necessary for the protection of the inhabitants of municipalities, and I hope that the Senate will find it proper to reject the amendment and to retain the provision that the amendment proposes to strike out.

Mr. GRONNA. May we have the amendment read, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, in line 24, after the word "State," it is proposed to strike out the following:

> But in any case where the State has not made provision for authorizing municipal corporations, political subdivisions, or other agencies of the State or public-utility corporations or agencies to engage in said business, the qualifications of the grantee prescribed in this proviso shall not apply.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, by a provision found in lines 8 and 9, on page 3 of the bill, it is provided that the permit when granted shall not be transferred—

> Except by trust deed or mortgage issued for the bona fide purpose of financing the business of such grantee * * * without the approval of the Secretary of War—

So that no transfer would be of any value whatever except by his approbation. Of course, it would not be subject to sale and disposition for the debt of the permittee, because, if it were seized and sold, the purchaser at the execution sale might not be able to get the approval of the Secretary of War.

On page 12 it is provided that the plant and all of the appurtenances shall be subject to taxation by the State authorities, and that is a very wise and salutary provision in this bill. Every dollar that is put into the property, like every dollar invested in any other business, ought to pay its just share of taxes. The provision is as follows:

> And the plant and its appurtenances of the grantee, including real, personal, and mixed property, constituting the same and used for the generation and distribution of power, or for other purposes, shall be subject to taxation under the laws of the State where situated as other similar property within the State, while owned by the grantee, or any subsequent owner who may acquire the same by purchase from the grantee, or other person, or under any proceeding herein authorized and provided for.

That, I repeat, is a very wise and a very salutary provision; but if the property is assessed for taxes and the taxes are not paid, and if then the property is sold to satisfy the delinquent taxes, the purchaser gets nothing, because every transfer of the property is forbidden, except it be with the approval of the Secretary of War. I submit, then, to the Senator from Tennessee whether, in order to accomplish the purpose that he has in view, it will not be necessary to take out the words "without the approval of the Secretary of War."

Then, Mr. President, I ask, Why should this permit be thus hampered in respect to its disposition by the permittee? If a company gets the permit and operates the property for a period of 10 or 12 or 15 years, and then the company wants to sell the property, or if it is an individual and he wants to sell the property, why should he be obliged to go and get the approval of the Secretary of War before he can make the transfer?

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, as I understand the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana, it is to strike out, in lines 8 and 9, the words "without the approval of the Secretary of War." The whole clause is this:

> And no transfer of any such permit or of the rights thereunder granted, except by trust deed or mortgage issued for the bona fide purpose of financing the business of such grantee, shall be made by any grantee, without the approval of the Secretary of War, to any transferee not having the qualifications herein specified for a grantee hereunder, and any successor or assign of the rights of any such grantee, whether by voluntary transfer, judicial sale, or foreclosure sale, or otherwise, shall be subject to all the conditions of the permit under which such rights are held by such grantee, and also subject to all the provisions and conditions of this act to the same extent as though such successor or assign were the grantee hereunder.

The amendment is, in substance, one that has just been rejected. It is in the same section, and provides that no transfer shall be made unless the grantee shall have the qualifications required in the preceding part of the section; in other words, it gives the preference to the municipality. If there is any objection of the kind suggested by the Senator from Montana, where the property is sold for taxes, which may be assessed under a subsequent provision of the act, that can be remedied when we reach that section of the bill; but this amendment, I think, should be, and I am hopeful will be, rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question. Does the Senator from Tennessee think it necessary to require the approval of the Secretary of War before one of these transfers can be made?

Mr. SHIELDS. I think it is necessary in order to preserve the preference in favor of municipal corporations. That is what it was intended to do; that is the whole object of it. Generally, in order to make such property more attractive, it ought to be subject to sale. The right to sell is, of course, one of the most essential qualities of property value; but this particular section relates to what has passed, to the provisions previous to the ones now objected to, and not to the whole bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Tennessee. I can not understand how he can put the construction on this language which he does put on it. It seems to me it will have the opposite effect, especially when you take into consideration the particular place where these words occur in the bill.

The section provides certain qualifications for the grantee or the permittee, as you might call him. Not everyone will have the right to become a grantee and to build a dam, as provided for in this section. As I understand, if we leave in the words which the Senator from Montana proposes to strike out by his motion, the language will mean that, notwithstanding the fact that a grantee must have certain qualifications specified in the bill, if the Secretary of War will consent, such a qualified grantee may transfer his interest to a person who does not possess those qualifications. I myself would have no objection to providing that no transfer shall be made without the consent of the Secretary of War; but this is the way it reads as the language now stands in the bill:

> And no transfer of any such permit or of the rights thereunder granted, except by trust deed or mortgage issued for the bona fide purpose of financing the business of such grantee, shall be made by any grantee, without the approval of the Secretary of War, to any transferee not having the qualifications herein specified for a grantee hereunder.

In other words, the bill provides certain qualifications before a corporation or a municipality can be entitled under the law to build a dam. A corporation thus qualified, we will say, build a dam. Subsequently they want to transfer the improvement to somebody who does not possess the qualifications required, and thus entirely nullify the provision concerning qualifications. They can do so if the Secretary of War will consent. His consent is the only thing standing in their way. I can not put any other construction upon that language. I take it that the Senator from Tennessee does not want to do that.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will direct the Senator's attention to what follows the language he has read:

And any succesor or assign of the rights of any such grantee, whether by voluntary transfer, judicial sale, or foreclosure sale or otherwise, shall be subject to all the conditions of the permit under which such rights are held by such grantee and also subject to all the provisions and conditions of this act to the same extent as though such successor or assign were the grantee hereunder.

So that it is expressly provided here that any purchaser or subsequent grantee, in the language of the bill, shall be subject to all the conditions and provisions of the bill. I certainly do not wish that the property may be sold and thus allow the subsequent purchaser to escape the provisions of this bill regulating the exercise of the power granted. On the contrary, it is expressly provided that he shall be subject to these provisions.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator, it seems to me, does not get the distinction between the qualifications of the grantee and the law that will control the operation of the plant under the grant. There is a distinction; otherwise why is it provided in the same section:

That when the power to be developed by the project and improvement of the stream for navigation is used or to be used for a public-utility purpose or purposes the grantee must be—a municipal corporation, or a political subdivision, or other agencies of a State, or a public-service agent of a State, or a public-utility corporation created and organized under the laws of a State or the United States.

Then the bill provides who the grantee must be; there are several classes—

Those are the only classes qualified under this bill to become grantees where the object of the water development is for a public-utility purpose or purposes. Then the bill says that the grantee shall not transfer or sell his right to any person or persons not qualified to take it originally, unless the Secretary of War shall consent. It is true that if the Secretary of War consented and the grantee transferred his right to some one who was not qualified under the bill, the transferee would have to comply in the management of the plant with the bill as the Senator has read it, but I think by leaving in the words indicated by the Senator from Montana at the place where they are found in the bill, we practically say any person or corporation will be qualified to become a grantee under this bill, provided the Secretary of War agrees to the transfer.

If that be the object, then we have put in a lot of useless language, because the committee has tried to provide that only certain persons or corporations can become grantees under this bill, and then it is provided that they can not transfer their grant to anybody else who does not possess the same qualifications that they possess unless the Secretary of War consents.

I take it that the object of the committee was to prevent any transfer except with the permission and with the consent of the Secretary of War, and to that I have no objection; but the place in the bill where they have put this language, if I understand it, would enable the Secretary of War absolutely to nullify the provisions of the bill so far as the qualification of the grantee is concerned. Why not add at the end of the section such a provision as this:

Provided, however, That no transfer shall be made without the consent of the Secretary of War.

That would do away with the objection I am making, but if you leave in the words "without the approval of the Secretary of War" as they are now, they apply only to the transfer to some one else who does not possess the qualifications that the original grantee must possess before he can get the right to develop the power. Let me read it as it would read with the words stricken out:

And no transfer of any such permit or of the rights thereunder granted, except by trust deed or mortgage issued for the bona fide purpose of financing the business of such grantee, shall be made by any grantee to any transferee not having the qualifications herein specified for a grantee hereunder.

Now, I have read it with the objectionable words stricken out as they would be stricken out if the amendment of the Senator from Montana should prevail. If you leave those words in, then you say in substance that no transfer shall be made of this property to anyone who does not possess the qualifications necessary under the law for an original grantee unless the Secretary of War shall consent.

Let us suppose a case where some one properly qualified under the law secures such a grant as the bill provides, and after it has been obtained he happens to be a friend of the Secretary of War, who perhaps has no sympathy with this law. The grantee can make money if he can sell his rights to some one who has none of the qualifications provided by law, and if the Secretary of War consents to the transfer, he makes the sale. It is legal; there is not any way to prevent it; he has complied absolutely with the statute. In other words, if you leave those words in there, as I look at it, you have placed it absolutely in the hands of the Secretary of War to nullify the act so far as the qualifications of the grantee are concerned.

I admit that even after that transfer was made the transferee would be subject to the laws that exist regulating rates, and so forth, but the act has been nullified so far as the qualifications of the grantee are concerned. It seems to me that those words ought to go out.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I trust the Senator from Tennessee will address his mind to the considerations advanced by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. There is no possibility of getting away from the conclusion he has stated. This language means that the Secretary of War may authorize the transfer to a person who would otherwise be disqualified under the act. That is what the language means right there.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, while I do not agree with the construction Senators have placed on this provision, certainly I do not intend it to have the effect that they say it will have; and in order that I may further consider the question according to the intention of the committee, I will ask that the amendment be passed over for the present.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, right in that connection let me ask the Senator if he believes, and if the committee concur in his view, that no transfer ought to be made without the consent of the Secretary of War? I am not contesting that at all; but I should like to have the Senator consider, in connection with the proposal to strike out the words suggested by the Senator from Montana, the addition of another proviso at the end of the section, which would read:

Provided, however, That no transfer shall be made without the consent of the Secretary of War.

Mr. SHIELDS. The committee will consider that.

Mr. NORRIS. I think that will fully meet the idea the Senator wants to convey.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, there is another matter in that same connection to which I desire to invite the attention of the Senator from Tennessee—one of very particular importance, if my judgment in the matter is of any value whatever. The proviso on page 2, which engaged our attention a little while ago, very properly provides that a municipal corporation may secure a permit from the Government. The language is:

That when the power to be developed by the project and improvement of the stream for navigation is used or to be used for a public-utility purpose or purposes the grantee must be a municipal corporation, or a political subdivision, or other agencies of a State—

And so on.

But a proviso at the bottom of page 17, section 11, reads as follows:

And provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to irrigation or power dams or grants to municipal corporations affecting the use of water or water power for municipal purposes.

I inquire of the Senator how, then, will a municipal corporation get a permit to construct a dam for the purpose of generating power for municipal purposes?

Mr. SHIELDS Mr President, the provision to which the Senator refers has been only partially read by him. It proceeds—

Or to other projects approved or erected under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture upon the public lands of the United States.

It is limited in that way. The Senator also has an amendment to strike out the language that I have read. I suggest that he present the criticism which he now makes when we reach that particular amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to the language on page 2, in line 9, where, in giving construction to the act, it says:

And shall be construed to mean political subdivisions of States, municipal corporations, corporations, companies, and associations—

And so forth. I do not know that it is of any particular importance, or that such an application would ever be made; but ought not this construction of persons also to mean States as well as political subdivisions of a State? We might have a case, I suppose—while there may be no such case now, as time goes on there may be cases—where the State itself would want to make application under this law for power.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will say to the Senator that that matter was fully considered by the committee, and in the first draft of the bill States were included. There are, however, some subsequent provisions in the bill that provide that the grantee shall be subject to the orders, rules, and regulations made by the Secretary of War, and for violation of them shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and quite a number of other provisions along those lines. The committee, I think very properly, struck out "States," because Congress would hesitate long before it would provide that one of the sovereign States of the Union should be ordered about by the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers, and should be guilty of a misdemeanor for violating a regulation. If a sovereign State should at any time desire to make a development of the kind provided by this bill, it could come to Congress and get a special permit for that purpose. It would not be a frequent case, however.

Mr. NORRIS. No; it may never occur.

Mr. SHIELDS. And it may never occur.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think we should hesitate to put a State in such a humiliating attitude as that would do if it were included in the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I should not consider that it was any more humiliating to a State than to a political subdivision of a State, and that is already in the bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. It is.

Mr. NORRIS. In other words, you provide here that a political subdivision of a State may make application under the bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. And I regret that a subdivision of a State or a municipality should be made subject to the orders of a Federal officer here in Washington. The bill, however, is of course a compromise of views upon the subject, and there are some who insisted that such a provision should be contained in it.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, I want to ask the Senator another question: If this bill should become a law as it is proposed to be enacted here, and a State desired to build a dam in one of the navigable streams to develop power for the lighting of its capitol and capitol grounds, it would not be permitted to do so under this bill, would it?

Mr. SHIELDS. In effect, any State could do so by creating one of these public utilities or a special corporation for that purpose, just as Congress has created a corporation to construct the Panama Canal.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. In other words, the State would have to proceed in an indirect way. It could not do it directly?

Mr. SHIELDS. It is very proper, I think, that such a policy should not be provided.

Mr. NORRIS. It does not seem to me that in the law we ought to prohibit a State from doing that if the State wants to do it. I have no State in mind that has any such object in view; but, speaking for myself, if a State—the State of Maryland, let us say—wanted to build a dam in a navigable stream for the purpose of developing water power and electric energy, or for the purpose of manufacturing nitrogen, or for the purpose of using the prisoners of the State in some occupation, or something of that kind, I can not see why we should not permit it to do so the same as anybody else. It seems to me that it ought to have a preference; that if it desires to avail itself of this law it ought to be allowed to do so.

Mr. SHIELDS. I fully agree with the Senator, but it would be incongruous to put such a provision in this bill. There are provisions in it that would be wholly inconsistent with the rights and dignities of States. States may exercise this right through corporations created for that express purpose, through subdivisions of the State, or through public agencies. That language is used in this section. Then, again, if at any time the State of Maryland or any other State desired to make such a development Congress would not hesitate, if it was right to do so, to grant a special act with provisions that are consistent with the dignities and rights of the States, instead of those that are in this bill.

In other words, if the Senator will consider this entire subject and all the provisions of this bill, he will find that it contains restrictions and limitations which it would be improper to impose upon the States of the Union, and that the rights of States and of private corporations can not be treated in the same way and in the same bill. To put the States in this bill, I think, would substantially require a rewriting of the measure.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. It seems to me that the thought of the Senator from Nebraska is fully covered in the words "other agencies of a State or a public-service agent of a State." The State would have to operate through some organization, and any such organization must come within either the phrase "other agencies of a State" or the phrase "public-service agent of a State."

I rose, however, to ask the Senator another question, and I will premise it by a statement. I do not believe there is any possible operation for the proviso. I do not believe there is a State in the Union to which it will apply; and I believe that the whole of the section after the word "Provided," in line 13, is meaningless.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand. Of course I had nothing to do with the drafting of it; but I am informed—if I am wrong, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] might correct me—that under some of the language of this proviso it is expected that the State of Minnesota and the cities of St. Paul and Minneapolis will probably build a dam in the Mississippi River. Is that true?

Mr. NELSON. No; there is a Government dam built there. There is another section of the bill that relates to that. This provision of the bill relates to the construction of dams by others than the Government.

Mr. CUMMINS. What I mean is this: The proviso contains these words:

But in any case where the State has not made provision for authorizing municipal corporations——

Mr. NORRIS. I did not have reference to those words.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; nor did I in the suggestion I made a moment ago.

Political subdivisions, or other agencies of the State or public-utility corporations or agencies to engage in said business, the qualifications of the grantee prescribed in this proviso shall not apply.

I repeat that there is not a State in the Union and there can not be a State in the Union which has not made such provision concerning some one or more of these instrumentalities, and therefore the proviso concerning which we have been talking will never apply. I venture to say there is not an imaginable case in the United States to which the proviso could apply.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator mean the balance of the proviso now or just what he has read?

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course, the balance of the proviso goes with the part I have read.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. If you neutralize the limitation contained in the proviso up to the point at which I began to read, if the instance to which that part of it is intended to apply never occurred, then, of course, the event described in that part of the section to which the Senator has just been addressing himself and concerning which the amendment is proposed to be adopted would never occur, and the whole act would end in all its substance with the first word "provided," in line 13.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss the amendment that has been rejected; but the Senator is entirely mistaken in saying that a case can not be imagined where the municipality has not the power by its charter to develop water power. I know of such cases in my own State, and I think if the Senator will take up the charters of thousands of municipalities in the United States he will find that there are numbers of them with very limited power, and they certainly do not include such a power as that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly. The Senator from Tennessee is clearly right; but he is not paraphrasing the provision to which I referred. Now, mark, let me state it once more. It is provided that this limitation shall not apply—where the State has not made provision for authorizing municipal corporations—

Now, there are instances in which it may not have authorized municipal corporations to do this, I agree.

Political subdivisions—

There may be cases in which the State has not authorized any political subdivision to do work of this character—or other agencies of the State—

There may be instances in which no such provision as an agency of the State has been arranged for—or public-utility corporations—

Is there a State in the Union that has not a public utility corporation? I believe not—or agencies to engage in said business—

That is, any activity that engages in the business of supplying water, heat, or electric energy. Now, if there is any State in the Union that has not one or the other of those agencies, then the Senator's limitation would have some effect; but if there is no such State, it would have no application.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then I will ask the Senator, What harm can it do?

Mr. CUMMINS. It means that it is keeping the promise to the ear and breaking it to the hope. In the first place, it is suggested that you give public utility purposes the preference. You do not. It is suggested that you give municipal corporations the preference in public utility work. In my judgment, you do not; and you leave the act precisely as it is contained in the first part, namely—that the word "persons," as used in this act, shall be construed to mean both the singular and plural as the case demands, and shall be construed to mean political suodivisions of States, municipal corporations, corporations, companies, and associations; and the term "grantee" herein shall mean any such persons to whom shall be granted a permit as herein provided.

And you have neither given preference to public-utility demands, nor have you given the preference in public-utility demands to municipal corporations or political subdivisions of a State.

Of course, I know that the Senator from Tennessee did not intend any such thing. I confess I may be wrong. I am speaking from an analysis, however, that I have made with some care. I intend to offer an amendment to this section, not just the equivalent of the one that has been voted down, but an amendment to the section, in which public utility—that is, public service—shall be given the first consideration, and providing that in rendering the public service the municipal corporation or the political subdivision shall have the preference.

Mr. SHIELDS. Of course, the Senator's opinion, both as a lawyer and as a legislator, is entitled to great weight; but the subcommittee considering this provision of the bill at the last session of the Congress, and this Senate, differed with him. The entire Committee on Commerce differed with him. As a member of it, I differ with him now in his construction. It was intended to give municipalities a preference. That question has already been discussed here, and the Senate has agreed with the committee presenting the bill and has rejected the amendment offered. We think it amply protects the interests of the municipalities, as it was intended to do, although not in the language that the Senator would prefer. Of course, he has the right to offer an amendment in his own language to carry out the purpose which we think is amply provided for in the bill.

I do not understand, however, that this discussion is germane to the suggestion made by the Senator from Nebraska. There is no amendment offered now, as I understand, and I ask that the reading of the bill be proceeded with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to further amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is the bill being considered section by section, and is it the order that it be adopted section by section?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is nothing of that kind that the Chair knows of. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment at any place, as the Chair understands.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is, any part of the bill will be open to amendment until it is finally disposed of?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, it is desired to have a short executive session. Would the Senator from Tennessee consent to temporarily laying the bill aside and going into executive session at this time?

Mr. SHIELDS. Unless the Senator has some special reason for going into executive session at this time, I should prefer to proceed with the bill.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I shall not insist on it, but I give notice that I want a short executive session before adjournment. I thought Senators had amendments they were going to offer, and perhaps they were not ready with them. I shall not insist, however, upon taking that action at this particular time. If the Senator from Tennessee wishes to proceed, I shall not object.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will yield to the Senator's desire in the matter. I ask that the bill be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, may I not ask simply for an opportunity for a vote on the joint resolution that was up to-day? I am sure there will be no debate upon it. The joint resolution has been amended, and is now in shape for final passage.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not think it is possible to get a vote upon it. It would necessitate calling the roll.

Mr. SHIELDS. I ask for action on my request that the bill be temporarily laid aside.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 16, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 15, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We come to Thee, O God our Father, praying for that grace which makes for increased devotion to right and truth and justice, that our homes may be clean, our Republic pure. "Righteousness exalteth a nation, while sin is a reproach to any people." Help us to consecrate ourselves anew to the work which Thou hast given us to do, that with patience, industry, and perseverance we may fulfill the desires of Thy heart and satisfy the highest and purest aspirations of our own souls this day. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the urgent deficiency bill (H. R. 9416) and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] calls up the conference report on the urgent deficiency bill and asks that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 174) (S. DOC. NO. 319).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9416) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 7, 9, and 22.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 4, 6, 10, 13, 15, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 23, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, and 39, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 8: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Omit all of that part of the matter inserted by said amendment after the word "purposes" in line 21; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 12: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$25,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 16: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"NATIONAL PARKS.

"There is appropriated, for the remainder of the fiscal year 1916, from the several appropriations for protection, improvement, and management, etc., of the various national parks, including the Hot Springs Reservation, as well as from the revenues from privileges, etc., in the national parks and the Hot Springs Reservation, such sum or sums as the Secretary of the Interior in his judgment may deem necessary, to be expended in employment of the superintendent of national parks in the District of Columbia and in the field, and other necessary expenses in connection with the administration of the national parks and the Hot Springs Reservation; a detailed statement of such expenditures to be submitted to Congress."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 24: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Transpose the matter inserted by said amendment to follow line 6, page 28, of the bill; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 38: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 30 of the bill, in line 1, after the sum "$59,259.50," insert the following: ", and the judgment therein in favor of 'Andrew D. Everett, administrator, Thomas W. Everett, deceased,' shall read 'Thomas W. Everett, administrator, Andrew D. Everett, deceased,' and the judgment in favor of 'Mrs. Joseph E. Winn, administratrix, John Winn, deceased,' shall read 'John M. Winn and Mrs. Joseph E. Winn, administrators, John Winn, deceased'"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have been unable to agree on the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 5, 11, and 14.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
JOHN J. EAGAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

THOMAS S. MARTIN,
N. P. BRYAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement was read as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9416), making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior years, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of the said amendments, namely:

No. 3: Inserts the paragraph, proposed by the Senate, making an independent bureau of the Division of Efficiency of the Civil Service Commission.

No. 4: Appropriates $6,000 for traveling expenses and $300 for salaries of field examiners for the Civil Service Commission, as proposed by the Senate.

No. 6: Appropriates $3,000, as proposed by the Senate, for the subscription of the United States to the International Geodetic Association for the years 1915 and 1916.

No. 7: Strikes out the language, inserted by the Senate, in connection with the appropriation for the public building at Birmingham, Ala.

No. 8: Appropriates for the central heating, lighting, and power plant as proposed by the Senate and strikes out the language requiring the submission of the plans therefor to the Fine Arts Commission and the President of the United States.

No. 9: Appropriates $25,000, as proposed by the House, instead of $50,000, as proposed by the Senate, for repairs and preservation of public buildings.

No. 10: Appropriates $300,000, as proposed by the Senate, for the payment of claims arising under excise taxes levied by the act of August 5, 1909.

No. 12: Appropriates $25,000, instead of $50,000, as proposed by the Senate, for rural sanitation.

No. 13: Inserts the language proposed by the Senate relative to the publication of notices in condemnation cases for opening, widening, extending, etc., streets in the District of Columbia.

No. 15: Appropriates $1,250, as proposed by the Senate, for rental of additional quarters for the Navy Department.

No. 16: Makes available for the remainder of the fiscal year 1916 the appropriations and revenues of national parks for the employment of the superintendent and payment of administrative expenses of national parks in the District of Columbia and in the field.

Nos. 17, 18, and 19: Appropriates $5,000 for limited indemnity for lost domestic registered, insured, and collect-on-delivery mail for the fiscal year 1914, in the language proposed by the Senate.

No. 20: Appropriates $20,000, as proposed by the Senate, for investigation and eradication of the white-pine blister rust.

No. 21: Appropriates $75,000, as proposed by the Senate, for the destruction of wild animals infected with rabies in the Western and Northwestern States.

No. 22: Strikes out the appropriation of $750, inserted by the Senate, for a clerk to the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

No. 23: Appropriates $7,500, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $5,000, as proposed by the House, for maintenance of vessels of the Bureau of Fisheries.

No. 24: Authorizes, as proposed by the Senate, the payment to Mary Meyer, niece of Jacob C. Donaldson, deceased, late a skilled laborer in the Senate Library, the amount of salary due him for December, 1915, and transposes the item to follow the paragraph for the House Office Building.

No. 25: Appropriates $2,500, as proposed by the Senate, for maintenance of the Senate Office Building.

Nos. 26 and 27: Appropriates $27,576.15 for holiday pay and $48,866.76 for leaves of absence in the Government Printing Office, as proposed by the Senate.

No. 28: Appropriates $5,000, as proposed by the Senate, for printing and binding for the Court of Claims.

Nos. 29, 30, 31, and 32: Appropriates $5,006.89, as proposed by the Senate, for the payment of judgments of United States courts certified to Congress after the passage of the bill by the House.

Nos. 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, and 38: Appropriates $27,695.12, as proposed by the Senate, for the payment of judgments of the Court of Claims certified to Congress after the passage of the bill by the House, and, in accordance with the authority granted the conference committee in House concurrent resolution No. 16, corrects an error in the certification of two judgments in Indian depredation cases submitted to Congress in House Document No. 564.

No. 39: Appropriates $47,525.33, as proposed by the Senate, for the payment of claims allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department and certified to Congress after the passage of the bill by the House.

The committee of conference have been unable to agree on the following amendments of the Senate:

No. 1, relating to the Lincoln Memorial.

No. 2, relating to the Arlington Memorial Bridge.

No. 5, relating to the Division of Mexican Affairs in the Department of State.

No. 11, relating to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

No. 14, relating to the Powell School in the District of Columbia.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
JOHN J. EAGAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the adoption of the conference report. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] desired five minutes. Does the gentleman desire that time now?

Mr. GILLETT. I would like to say a word about the appropriation for the power plant either now or when that comes up.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. GILLETT. Five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word on this amendment on page 17, not criticizing the amendment or the agreement which has been made by the conferees, but simply to call attention to the conduct of executive departments in dealing with these appropriations. It is characteristic of administrations and executive methods, not only in this but in other administrations, and deserves to be pointed out and criticized in this House. When this appropriation was originally made by the Committee on Appropriations for $1,494,000 estimates were submitted, and in the hearing we were told that the power plant was to be built on certain lines, and it was explained to us just how they were going to build it and exactly how they were going to reach the desired results with this million and a half dollars. There was then appropriated $35,000 for architects, which, we were told, was not to be expended for outside services on the general plan, but to prepare specifications under this particular plan. Now, what happened after we gave them that appropriation upon that basis? Why, the Secretary of the Treasury, instead of carrying out the plans which had been explained to the committee and on which we supposed the power plant was to be built, took this $35,000 and employed some New York architects to make new specifications upon the whole plant. Some persons have been unkind enough to suggest that having $35,000 of patronage it was not fair that the city of New York should not enjoy it. I am not so uncharitable as to think that that was his purpose; but, whatever was his purpose, that money was absolutely wasted, because after employing these New York architects to make new plans they came in and reported that the power plant could not be built with the million and a half which had been set forth by us, but that it would cost several hundred thousand dollars more. They submitted specifications carrying out, of course, their prophecy, and when they called for bids the bids were, of course, several hundred thousand dollars above the amount which we had originally appropriated. I give the Secretary of the Treasury this credit—that, instead of doing what the executive departments generally do, either come to Congress for more money or go on and build a part of it and get it so far along that Congress is obliged to appropriate more to finish it, he abandoned the plans of the New York architects and went back to the original Treasury officials who had made the report to us, and, although the $35,000 had been thrown away and wasted, they say they have made plans now on which the plant can be built under the original cost.

I confess I have some misgivings as to whether they will be able now to accomplish what they expect, but they say they will accomplish it for the original cost, and this additional sum that is appropriated here is to carry out the original plan and also to heat additional buildings. So I presume if they are able to accomplish what they promise the original plan will be carried out, after the Secretary has done what executive officials usually do do, after he has departed from the plans which were presented to the Committee on Appropriations and had started to launch out on a different scheme. And yet I say to his credit, after wasting a certain amount of money, he abandoned the new scheme and has returned to the old one. So I am satisfied with the appropriation as it now stands, and I am simply hoping that they will be able to carry out the proposition in the way in which they themselves say they expect to do. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Massachusetts has fully justified the Treasury Department, I ask for a vote.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. May I ask the gentleman from New York a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What reason was assigned for the failure to submit plans for this heating plant to the Commission on Fine Arts?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There was no reason assigned to me. The question never came before me in that form; but, as I understand, an Executive order has been in force providing that all plans for public construction in Washington shall be submitted to the Commission on Fine Arts for their advice under the statute. It seems that the plans upon which the proposals were invited were prepared and in charge of persons not connected with the Supervising Architect's Office. After the proposals were examined it was ascertained that the building contemplated by those plans could not be constructed within the limit of cost. Thereupon the matter was placed in charge of the officials of the Supervising Architect's Office and the plans were modified so as to obtain the plant contemplated by Congress. When the heating plant was authorized it was then ascertained that the Commission on Fine Arts had not had submitted to them the plans in accordance with Executive order, and thereupon they were submitted to the Commission on Fine Arts.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And after they were submitted the Commission on Fine Arts criticized them severely, did they not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; they criticized particularly the ignorance of Congress in locating the power plant on the proposed site.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am not saying whether that is well founded or not. I am sure of my own ignorance——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, that is a fact. The gentleman might couch the expression of the fact in different language, but the criticism, as I understand it, is not to the plant, but to the location of the plant.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I desire in that connection to call the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to one particular criticism made by the Commission of Fine Arts, who declare that they knew nothing about the plans for this plant until after the contracts had practically been let. They say:

> Its close proximity to the Washington Monument will seriously affect the simple dignity of that structure, and its great bulk and huge stacks will cause a deplorable change in the entire aspect of that section of the city. The commission strongly disapprove of the plans for this structure as submitted, and view with grave anxiety the location of any such plant on this site.

So they do criticize severely not only the location of the plant, but also the plans which have been adopted for the structure itself.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They think that a power plant should be perfected without smokestacks and then that it should not be erected on this site at all. Thus far no plant has been successfully operated without stacks and substituting the forced draft in their place.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I would like to have two or three or four minutes on this.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I was much gratified when I saw in the newspapers that at last a Government power plant was to be erected. I did not understand, however, just where it was to be located, nor that there were to be great smokestacks approximately 200 feet high connected with the structure.

And here I call attention to an official order issued in 1910 by President Taft:

Plans for no public buildings to be erected in the District of Columbia for the General Government shall be hereafter finally approved by the officer duly authorized until after such officer shall have submitted the plans to the Commission of Fine Arts, created under the act of Congress of May 17, 1910, for its comment and advice.

In 1913 President Wilson issued an order:

It is hereby ordered that whenever new structures are to be erected in the District of Columbia under the direction of the Federal Government, which affect in any important way the appearance of the city, or whenever questions involving matters of art with which the Federal Government is concerned are to be determined, final action shall not be taken until such plans and questions have been submitted to the Commission of Fine Arts, designated under the act of Congress of May 17, 1910, for comment and advice.

Now, it is a fact, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, that notwithstanding these two orders the Commission of Fine Arts was absolutely ignored until after the plans for this important plant were adopted and the contract let. I have been told that one of the officials of the Treasury Department, in trying to explain this ignoring of the commission, said that they supposed the plans had been submitted to the commission before the contract was let. Apparently no pains were taken prior to the letting of the contract to ascertain whether the commission had any knowledge of the plans.

Now, the members of that commission accepted their appointments and have been giving their services to the Government out of a sense of public duty. They are among the very leading men in the United States in their respective professions. One of them, as gentlemen of the House will remember, is the architect of the beautiful State capitol at St. Paul, Minn., of the famous customhouse in New York City, and of the great Woolworth Building. Another is one of the foremost landscape artists of the world, and another is a sculptor of international fame. Each of the other members is a man of similar distinction in his profession. And yet this splendid commission was entirely ignored, both as to the plans for this great plant and as to its location, until after contracts had been made.

I have heard sneering references to this commission. It is only fair to say that they have as much right to speak, though not as much right to vote—but they have as much right to speak their views on this question as has any gentleman on this floor. They are American citizens, the city of Washington is their Capital as much as it is ours, and they are as much interested as we in seeing that nothing is built here which shall in anywise interfere with the harmonious development of the city or mar its architectural beauty. This commission was unanimous in condemning the plans and the location of this plant with these 200-foot smokestacks.

Mr. Speaker, may I ask of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] if that is a photograph [referring to a picture just brought into the Chamber] which has just been placed on the easel?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is one of the smokestacks [indicating] that will be removed as the result of this particular plant being erected, which is one of the disfiguring marks now of Washington.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But there is nothing there to show——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The proposed plant is shown in this picture, which has been taken from the top of the Washington Monument. Here is the proposed plant right here [indicating].

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I would like about three minutes more.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is the first time I have seen that photograph. Those two stacks in the photograph are hardly visible to the naked eye. But having read of the tricks of photography, I am wondering whether two 190-foot smokestacks in that location would be as nearly invisible as these are in that exhibit. Of course, that photograph is an entirely disinterested production, but nevertheless one can not help wondering whether it at all represents the way those two 190-foot smokestacks on that level ground would look to the average visitor anywhere in the western part of Washington.

Mr. Speaker, an Executive order should be issued which will prevent things of this kind. The officials of the executive departments should be made to understand that no Government building can hereafter be erected in this city until after the Commission of Fine Arts has had an opportunity to examine the plans and the proposed location, and to advise whether the proposed structure would tend to enhance or to deface the architectural and landscape beauty of the National Capital. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, a number of misguided gentlemen possessed of inaccurate information have been creating quite a stir about this proposed power plant.

One would imagine that Members of Congress were a set of vandals intent upon destroying, instead of preserving and developing, the beauty of the National Capital. The history of this power plant is interesting, and the subsequent developments are highly illuminating.

In June, 1913, an act was approved by the President which provided for the construction of this power plant upon this particular site at Fourteenth and B Streets, just east of the railroad embankment upon Washington Channel. For three or four years prior to that time Congress had been discussing the propriety of turning that particular site over to the District of Columbia for the purpose of erecting an asphalt plant upon it; and when this power plant was authorized, one-half of the property then owned by the United States Government was reserved with the intention hereafter of utilizing it as a site for an asphalt plant for the District of Columbia.

Since June, 1913, no architect, no member of the Fine Arts Commission, no distinguished engineer, no philanthropic citizen of the United States interested in the development of Washington, made the slightest suggestion that this was an inappropriate place for a power plant. This plant was authorized after the local lighting company had had an opportunity to submit to the Congress a proposition to light and heat the buildings to be included within a designated area. It was demonstrated that the construction of this plant would mean a very considerable saving to the Government. About a year ago the local company submitted a new proposition to the Treasury Department, and an analysis of that proposition demonstrated that there would be considerable economy to the Government in building this particular plant.

After the contracts for the construction of the building were made, since the beginning of this year, representatives of the local lighting company asked the Committee on Appropriations for an opportunity to be heard in opposition to the construction of the plant. They were afforded an opportunity. It was ascertained that they had nothing additional to offer, except to protest that the Government officials were so incompetent and that it would be impossible to build the plant for the sum estimated by them.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In a moment. I prefer to complete my statement; then I will yield. It was urged that this plant be not built, so that they might continue to furnish heat, light, and power to the Government buildings.

After they had failed to induce the committee to make a recommendation to stop work on this plant it was suddenly discovered by distinguished architects, engineers, and public-spirited citizens from all parts of the country that a great act of vandalism was about to be committed. No one objected to the construction of the power plant. Not one of these gentlemen objected to the Government having its own power plant, but they objected to its construction upon this particular site, which happened to be the one place owned by the Government and which, if utilized, made it an economy to build the plant rather than an extravagance. And so eminent gentlemen from all parts of the United States proceeded to bombard Members of Congress with telegrams, protesting against the desecration of Washington, protesting against the construction of a plant with four great smokestacks belching smoke and dust into the White House, asking that the contracts that had been made be arbitrarily suspended while some of those distinguished gentlemen might be permitted to make an investigation to determine just what should be done other than to build this particular plant.

The construction of this plant will eliminate 17 smokestacks from the area within which it is proposed to light and heat buildings and which those gentlemen desire to protect. The particular portion of the water front upon which this plant is to be located has been practically dedicated to commercial purposes. There is to be a fish wharf erected upon this portion of the water front. But some gentlemen imagine that they can so develop Washington that no part whatever of its water front shall be utilized for commercial purposes, but that it shall all be utilized merely as a portion or part of the development of a scheme of certain landscape architects and other prominent gentlemen. It was heralded that the stacks on this building were to be 235 feet high and would be a serious blot upon the horizon. As a matter of fact, those two stacks will be about 55 feet lower than the present stacks on the building of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, which will be removed when this plant is in operation. These stacks will be only 35 feet higher than the ridge of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing Building, and if anyone will take the trouble to go to the site of this proposed plant and see how very little of the Washington Monument, which is 555 feet high, can be seen over the Bureau of Engraving and Printing Building, he will realize the absolute impossibility of seeing these two stacks from any portion, practically, of Washington this side of the Mall.

The plant is located one mile and an eighth from the White House. I have met no one who has visited the proposed site of this plant who believes that it will be a detriment to the city of Washington. I have been in this city 17 years, and have endeavored, so far as possible in the prosecution of my official duties, to help build up and beautify the Capital of this country and make it worthy of the country, and to develop it along lines that will make it the finest capital in the civilized world, and I resent the impertinence of the distinguished architects and engineers who have called upon me for the purpose of protesting against the construction of this power plant, who were so absolutely ignorant of what is proposed to be done that I suggested that they were wasting both their own and my time. [Applause.]

No class of men in the United States are more interested in or more jealous of the development and beautification of the Capital than Members of the House of Representatives. Two distinguished engineers, who had never seen the plans of this plant, who knew nothing at all about them, were in Washington making the assertion that the plant could not be built within the sum fixed, although reputable contractors are now engaged in the work of building the plant, under contracts made with the United States Government. Misrepresentations of every conceivable character have been made about what the effect of this plant will be.

I think the statement is due to the House, so that Members may know what is being done. The president of the American Institute of Architects could not tell me within 50 feet what the height of those smokestacks would be, although he was protesting that there were to be so high that they would be offensive to persons on the other side of the city. The most offensive smokestacks in the city of Washington belong to the local lighting company, and are located on Fourteenth Street. If anyone wishes to look at those two filthy black stacks, which this company would utilize if the proposed lighting and heating were turned over to it rather than be supplied by the Government itself, he will realize just how much this plant will do toward the elimination of offensive features in the landscape of Washington. That local plant will probably be dismantled in the near future, as the suggestion has now been made that it be consolidated with one of the railway companies, since the goose that lays the golden egg, the Government contract, will be taken from it in large part and the light, heat, and power supplied by the Government itself.

If any gentleman wishes any information, I shall be glad to answer his questions. This much should be stated, however, for the RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have heard it stated that this proposition was never submitted to the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee, and I was wondering if a building costing a million and a half of dollars was not of such a character as would naturally be submitted to that committee for authorization.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This project did not originate in the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It originated in the Committee on Appropriations. After three years investigation the matter was taken up and gone into very fully, and the provision was reported to the House in the sundry civil appropriation bill. It was the subject of very considerable discussion on the floor of the House, and because of the absolute conviction that it was a matter that would result in great economy to the Government, and that it was necessary either to enlarge the existing power plant of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, or else obtain the light, heat, and power by contract.

It was believed that the Government itself should have a plant. We had had experience and knew what could be done in a Government plant. There was built and in operation the Capitol power plant, which had been built, although all of the great engineers of the country had protested that it could not be built within the limit of cost; and this plant as originally conceived was designed to be a duplicate of that plant, with a connection between the two, so that one could be utilized in case the other broke down or got out of repair.

Mr. KREIDER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KREIDER. I have had correspondence with some of my constituents in regard to this matter, and as a result of it I have taken up the matter with the Fine Arts Commission. I have been informed by that commission that they have never been consulted in regard to the location of this plant. The information which comes to me is that the location for this plant was selected by the Secretary of the Treasury, without consultation with the Fine Arts Commission.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no requirement of law that the Commission of Fine Arts shall be consulted as to where a building is to be located. Congress located this building itself, without consulting the Commission of Fine Arts; and that distinguished body, three years after the legislation was enacted, desired to have the whole matter suspended so that they might select the particular site that in their opinion would be more desirable. The Commission of Fine Arts interfered in the construction of the Bureau of Printing and Engraving——

Mr. KREIDER. I should like to ask the gentleman whether it is not true that there are to be two stacks erected, which are to be 180 or 190 feet high?

Mr. FITZGERALD. One hundred and eighty feet above the water.

Mr. KREIDER. And possibly two more. Now, laying all prejudice aside, does the gentleman say that it is a proper thing for a plant of this sort, with these stacks, to be erected so near the Washington Monument, so near to the new Potomac Park, and so near to the various public buildings; and does he state that it is in harmony with the general plan to beautify and improve the city of Washington to allow such a building to be located at this spot?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The plant is not to be so near to other buildings as the gentleman would have the House understand.

Mr. KREIDER. Is not this in a part of the city which has been devoted specially to the purpose of beautifying the National Capital, and is it not a fact that this plant is being built right in that particular spot?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I suggest that he go down and look at the site himself. The disreputable water front there will be very much improved and enhanced in appearance by the construction of the power plant.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What was the exact date when Congress authorized the construction of this building?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The sundry civil act was approved June 23, 1913. The matter was under discussion for two years prior to the time when the sundry civil bill was reported, and there was never a suggestion from any of those distinguished gentlemen that there was any impropriety in erecting a power plant on that particular site.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Did the provisions of this bill locate this power plant at that point?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It did, and I will read it so that there shall not be any misunderstanding. The sundry civil appropriation act approved June 23, 1913, contained this provision:

CENTRAL HEATING AND POWER PLANT.

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to have constructed, under the direction of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, upon the land and wharf property of the United States hereinafter described, a central heating, lighting, and power plant, to furnish heat, light, and power for the buildings, old and new, of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, the buildings of the Department of Agriculture, the Treasury Building, the White House and the buildings on the grounds thereof, the State, War, and Navy Building, the Winder Building, the Mills Building, the Court of Claims Building, the buildings, old and new, of the National Museum, the Smithsonian Institution Building, the Army Medical Museum Building, the Fish Commission Building, the Washington Monument, the District Building, the Post Office Department Building, and the buildings, when constructed on the site heretofore acquired, for each of the Departments of State, Justice, and Commerce and Labor.

The total limit of cost of such central heating, lighting, and power plant, including all necessary buildings, boilers, engines, generators, pumps, machinery appliances and equipment, tunnels, ducts, etc., is fixed at not to exceed the sum of $1,494,104; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to enter into contracts to the full limit of cost hereby fixed.

Authority is given for making a cross connection between the central heating, lighting, and power plant aforesaid and the Capitol power plant, so that either plant may supply to the other electric energy in case of a breakdown or other emergency, such connection to be equipped with the necessary meters so that reimbursement may be made for the amount of current actually supplied by either of said plants to the other.

The lease dated April 8, 1908, between the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and John Miller for wharf property in the District of Columbia, situated on the Potomac River and described as structures Nos. 24, 25, 26, and 27, section 3, as shown on the official map placed in evidence by the United States in the case of the United States against Martin F. Morris and others (174 U. S., p. 196), for a period of five years ending March 15, 1913, and any interest thereunder, is terminated without compensation under the covenant contained in said lease that it may be terminated at any time without compensation by act of Congress, and the land and property covered by said lease, being land owned by the United States fronting on Water Street between Thirteenth and Thirteen-and-a-half Streets SW., together with land owned by the United States on the Potomac River, fronting on Water Street between Thirteen-and-a-half and Fourteenth Streets SW., are hereby designated as the site for said heating, lighting, and power plant: Provided, That the building or buildings of said central heating, lighting, and power plant shall be so located upon said site as to reserve a sufficient area for an asphalt plant for the District of Columbia in the event of such asphalt plant being hereafter authorized.

For the commencement of said plant the sum of $150,000 is appropriated.

The Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized and empowered to employ, without reference to the civil-service laws and regulations, on a salary basis in the Office of the Supervising Architect such technical services as may be deemed necessary in connection with the plans, specifications, and construction of the power plant herein provided for, and to pay for such services at such price or rates of compensation as he may consider just and reasonable from the appropriation hereinbefore made: Provided, That not to exceed $35,000 shall be available from said appropriation for such technical services: And provided further, That the foregoing authorization for securing the services of specially qualified persons shall be in addition to and independent of the authorizations and appropriations for personal services in the Office of the Supervising Architect otherwise made.

That was the law enacted in 1913. If any gentleman ever saw an asphalt plant, he would appreciate what a thing of beauty a power plant is compared to it. Yet those distinguished gentlemen whose representatives are located in Washington never made the slightest suggestion of the impropriety of this plant until a series of events had disclosed that the local lighting company had been defeated in its attempt to prevent the construction of this plant. It may have been a mere coincidence. Many peculiar coincidences occur, but that does not add anything to the force of the objections which are made at this time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Is this the only available place on the water front where the plant would have both railroad and water facilities for bringing what they need and cheap facilities for carrying away the waste?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is, and there were chiefly two reasons that Congress had in selecting the site: One was the elimination of much of the nuisance that would be occasioned by hauling coal and ashes, and the other, according to the testimony of men competent to judge, that this is the ideal location for an auxiliary steam plant in the event that Congress should determine to develop the Great Falls water power to furnish heat and light and power for the city of Washington. These two factors, in addition to the other consideration, that this was the only site owned by the Government and would not have to be acquired at an exorbitant price, were controlling considerations in the selection of the site.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9416) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior years, and for other purposes, and had insisted upon its amendments numbered 1, 2, 5, 11, and 14, upon which the committee of conference was unable to agree, asked a further conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. BRYAN, and Mr. WARREN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield to the gentleman from Kansas two minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I happen to know just where this plant is to be located, and I have some idea as to the effect it would have on the beauty of Washington. Just now there are elevated tracks there for the purpose of bringing in coal, and there are coal chutes right up to Fourteenth Street where coal is dumped from the cars into the coal bins. There is an unsightly lot of low buildings, yards, etc., in the immediate vicinity. I am of the opinion that if a building of the cost of this be located there, that it will add very materially to the beauty of that section of Washington. It would be difficult, indeed, to do anything that would add to the unattractive landscape that is there now.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. About how far is it from the present Bureau of Engraving and Printing?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Diagonally across the street; I should say 300 or 400 feet.

Mr. FESS. How far is it from the Agricultural Building?

Mr. CAMPBELL. About four blocks.

Mr. FESS. And from the Washington Monument it is quite a distance.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is a long distance. I pass this point frequently. Nothing, in my judgment, around there could be hurt by the erection of this building. It is right on the water front. The railroad is only far enough from the water front to have coal bins, and some buildings, I think, now are used for a fish market. It is a very unsightly place at present.

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman think it would be a distinctive advantage to the beauty of the city to locate this plant there?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think it would be a distinctive advantage to that particular vicinity.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. HOUSTON]. Twenty-five minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin five minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I wish at the outset, in reply to the gentleman from New York, to say that nobody connected with any heating or lighting plant, or with any other kind of plant, in this city has directly or indirectly in any manner communicated with me on this subject. The persons who brought it to my attention were Col. Harts, the very efficient Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, and Mr. Cass Gilbert, of New York, a member of the Commission of Fine Arts. I had no previous personal acquaintance with Mr. Gilbert, although I knew him by reputation as one of the most distinguished of American architects.

The gentleman from New York spoke of the two smokestacks of the local plant that stand south of the Avenue on Fourteenth Street. But, Mr. Speaker, I have more than once called attention to those two black, disfiguring stacks. But what the gentleman from New York said about them was well calculated to convey the impression that the company owning the local plant is responsible for the criticism of the proposed Government plant. Not at all. The gentleman is mistaken. The trouble began when the commission discovered that in this very important matter, one of the very kind it was created to consider, it had been ignored absolutely. Its members had a right to be rather surprised if not indignant that they should have been disregarded in a matter so important to Washington. They give their time and counsel to the Government for nothing.

Now the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], in reply to my question, said that Congress adopted this location in 1913. What was the exact date?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The law was approved June 23, 1913.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I call the especial attention of the House to that fact. This was located by Congress in June, 1913. At that time, and for some time later, the mandatory order of President Taft was in force:

> Plans for no public buildings to be erected in the District of Columbia for the General Government shall be hereafter finally approved by the officer duly authorized until after such officer shall have submitted the plans to the Commission of Fine Arts, created under the act of Congress of May 17, 1910, for its comment and advice.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Wisconsin does not think that an Executive order of President Taft would in any way prevent Congress from determining where a particular public building should be erected in this city?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Not at all; but the commission thought, and had a right to think, that under that order of the President they would, of course, be consulted before the letting of a contract to build a great plant, with 190-foot smokestacks, within 300 or 400 feet of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. But it appears that after the location had been fixed President Wilson issued a new order, which reads as follows:

> It is hereby ordered that whenever new structures are to be erected in the District of Columbia under the direction of the Federal Government which affect in any important way the appearance of the city, or whenever questions involving matters of art with which the Federal Government is concerned are to be determined, final action shall not be taken until such plans and questions have been submitted to the Commission of Fine Arts designated under the act of Congress of May 17, 1910, for comment and advice.

This order leaves it to the Treasury officials to say that any proposed Government building will not "affect in any important way the appearance of the city," and then to proceed to draw plans, let contracts, and ignore the Fine Arts Commission. The Treasury officials have only to say that any Government building for which they draw plans, no matter how large it is to be nor where to be located, will not "affect in any important way the appearance of the city."

At the time when that site was selected the order of President Taft was in force and required that plans for the building must be submitted to the commission before they could be finally approved. But after this site had been selected President Wilson issued an order which, in so far as plans were concerned, as I have said, practically opened a way for Treasury officials to ignore the commission. Secretary McAdoo says that it is all right where it is to be located. The Commission of Fine Arts, much more competent than he to judge, say that it will be a blot upon the landscape.

Mr. Speaker, I wish in this connection to call the attention of the House to what Col. Harts said:

It is understood that prevailing winds in Washington are from the south and the southeast. This being so, smoke or gases arising from the plant would be distributed over the areas upon which are located the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, the Smithsonian Institution, the new National Museum, the buildings of the Department of Agriculture, the White House propagating gardens and conservatories, and the tree growths of the Mall, and other valuable properties upon which the Government has expended great care and vast sums of money.

The commission strongly disapprove of the plans for this structure as submitted, and view with grave anxiety the location of any such plant on this site.

It is to be not only a heating plant, but subsequently an asphalt plant is to be added.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 2. An act for the coinage of a McKinley souvenir gold dollar in commemoration of the erection of a memorial to William McKinley, late President of the United States; and

H. R. 73. An act to amend chapter 231, known as the Judicial Code, act of March 3, 1911, volume 36, United States Statutes at Large, section 81, page 1111.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have at all times tried to aid in preserving the Commission of Fine Arts. I believe they have done very valuable work, and I think they have a usefulness for the future; but I am not so wedded to them as to be blind to actualities, particularly as they apply to this case. What was done touching the location of this plant was done in the open. Anyone who paid the slightest attention to the action of Congress touching these matters was aware of what had been done. The Fine Arts Commission could have known, and should have known, what was done. The protest that has been made has been made at an absurdly late day. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] talks about an order of President Taft touching the plan of buildings that are to be erected in the District of Columbia. The complaint of the Fine Arts Commission is as to the site. The fact remains that any site that is chosen for the building of a power plant in Washington can have urged against it various objections. It is impossible to place a power plant, with the smokestacks that are essential under present development to such a plant without creating a building that will not fully meet the esthetic ideas of people and which will be in some respects objectionable; but the practical questions are whether it is now possible to stop the work, and whether the harm, assuming there is a harm, to the beauty of Washington is such as to warrant us in stopping a work which has reached the point this has.

I believe that it will not be an attractive building, not from the White House, not from the Washington Monument, not the Lincoln Memorial, because from those angles of view the building will not be in any true sense objectionable; but when you go down on Potomac Drive there will be certain places where, viewing it, you will see a power plant instead of seeing some architecturally beautiful building. But you must take the practical with the esthetic. You can not have a dream city in a place where men live and work and have their being, and here you have a location that is peculiarly desirable from the standpoint of economic administration of a plant. Why? Because you have two factors. You have rail and water communication in a way that could not be made available in any other place in the city. Of course there is something to be said against the beauty of it, but that could be said no matter where the plant was placed, and you are faced with the proposition of whether you are willing to carry your view of the beautifying of Washington to such an impracticable extent as to deny the having of a plant here at all. I insist that there is nothing in this location that makes it peculiarly offensive. It does not interfere with the proper development of the Mall. If you will go down along the Potomac Driveway, which has just been made on the reclaimed land, and look across, you will see a certain part of Washington that is given up to commercial pursuits. It is the water front, where the boats, both passenger and freight, land; it is where the coal yards are; it is where certain business of a city like this has to be conducted; and unless you simply denied to the city its normal, usual activities, you could not get rid of a great many eyesores along that particular water front. This building is being put at a place where it does not accentuate in any way the ugliness that exists by virtue of the kind of business that is carried on along that water front. Many men have protested without the slightest knowledge, and I join in the statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], that it amounts to the last degree of impudence for men who do not know anything about the physical condition of Washington to not only come here and undertake to berate Members of Congress for doing what they consider to be their duty, but undertake to build a back fire over the country. We find chambers of commerce over the country adopting resolutions of indignation and of protest against our action, and the very men who voted for those resolution could not have told you to save their lives any of the basic facts connected with the beautification of Washington. They could not have told you the real points of the compass as they bear relation to the Washington Monument, the Capitol, and these other buildings.

I insist that Congress is entitled to fair treatment by these people. We are not sitting here devising ways and means to destroy the beauty of this city. Some of us who have worked, not spasmodically but year in and year out, for the development and beautification of Washington may surely claim to have some little knowledge of actual conditions. I am glad to receive the advice of distinguished men—distinguished in architecture, in landscape planning, and in all of the matters that go to make a city more beautiful—but I deeply resent men relying upon the influence of their names to carry their viewpoint when their viewpoint is not based upon knowledge. All over this country have been resolutions and agitations about this matter by men who do not know the facts, and it would have better become them if they had come here and investigated and then told us something at the time when their knowledge might have been availed of than to come here in the ninth hour without information and undertake to stampede Congress. I am not imputing their motives, and I am not going to suggest that there is any relationship between the local lighting company and this agitation. I have reached the point in life where I am tired of bothering about the motives of men; but I say to you the Fine Arts Commission has utterly failed to arrive at the information which they could by ordinary diligence have arrived at at the time when their protests would have been of value.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Why, at the time this plan was adopted the commission had the right to believe, under the order of President Taft, that no building would be erected or plans adopted without being submitted to them before construction began.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand; but that would have had nothing on earth to do with the site. The Executive order of President Taft does not relate to sites, but deals with plans of buildings.

We have a right to expect the commission to have ordinary common sense as well as simply knowledge of its supposed rights. I say to you that a commission dealing with the beautification of Washington, meeting here several times a year, that lets two years go by touching a matter of this magnitude and importance is without excuse for saying they did not know until this late day what was being done. They ought to have known it, and I say that as a friend of the commission and not as their enemy.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It might have been impertinent if the commission should have volunteered a suggestion. It was their duty to wait until the plans were submitted to them.

Mr. SHERLEY. If it was simply an impertinence two years ago, when something might have been done, it is worse than impertinence now, when nothing can be done. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit another interruption?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. They could not with propriety make a suggestion until under that order plans were submitted to them, and the only thing they could do was to wait until that was done.

Mr. SHERLEY. That does not accord with what seems to me to be common sense. Here is a commission complaining now and saying they would have complained sooner if they had known what was being done, while the gentleman from Wisconsin says they could not have complained sooner even if they had known, because they would have to wait and see if plans would be submitted.

I point again to the fact that the quarrel is not about plans, but it is about the site. The submission of plans after the site was determined would not have changed the matter. Now, we are faced with this question: Shall we stop contracts, incur the liability that may come from the breaking of those contracts, postpone the doing of work that Congress after an elaborate study has believed ought to be done in the interest of economy—shall we do that upon the criticism of people who come with no alternative proposition, and who say, after two years delay, that they would like additional time to look into the matter? I submit we are not warranted in so doing. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 8810. An act to amend an act relating to the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia, approved March 4, 1913.

The message also announced that the President had approved and signed joint resolution and bill of the following titles:

S. J. Res. 76. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to loan 1,000 tents and 1,000 cots for the use of the encampment of the United Confederate Veterans to be held at Birmingham, Ala., in May, 1916; and

S. 900. An act amending sections 476, 477, and 440 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make this suggestion, that the executive officer of the Fine Arts Commission is the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, the Army officer in charge of Potomac Park.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have been down where this site mentioned is located a great many times, both walking and riding. We used to ride down from the Capitol on the way to Potomac Park, going along the road that runs by the railroad bridge. A great many times since the new drive on the north side of the peninsula has been opened I have ridden down there at least every other day since the middle of last November. All along Washington Channel, on this side of it, are boat landings, wharves, and various enterprises, none of which conduces to the beauty of the landscape, and while it might be desirable, if possible, to locate the power site where no one could see it, and it might be desirable to have Potomac Park separated so that you could see nothing in the way of business outside of it, yet that is practically impossible. I venture to say that if the Fine Arts Commission had been asked to select a site for this power plant in advance they would have selected the identical place which Congress did select. [Applause.]

Now they suggest that the power plant ought to be down here close to the Capitol, where the present Capitol power plant is; but if we had proposed in the first place to locate it there the Fine Arts Commission would have said it would destroy the beauty of the landscape near the Capitol Building, because that is a great deal closer to the Capitol Building than this power site down beyond is to the White House. I have a great deal of respect for the Fine Arts Commission, and yet I recall that it was that commission, or its predecessor, which imposed upon us the location of the Grant Monument, and no worse location could have been found in the District of Columbia. [Applause.] I remember that it was the Fine Arts Commission, or its predecessor, which located the beautiful Agricultural Building one story below the level of the ground [applause], so that employees there have to work practically without air in the hot climate of Washington. I prefer to believe that the men in Congress, who remain here year after year and study the needs of Washington, both as to beauty and utility, are better qualified to judge where a plant like this should be located than some one who only occasionally visits Washington, or even Mr. Glenn Brown, in Washington, who dominates the architects who live here. It was not for the Fine Arts Commission to determine the site. Congress owning, as the Government did, this site, proposed to locate this power plant there because that was the appropriate place from the standpoint of beauty, utility, and economy for the Government to put it there. I do not object to these gentlemen on the outside bombarding us with telegrams and letters, which serve the purpose of calling our attention to the proposition.

They do not expect us to seriously consider telegrams which they send us about things which they know nothing about and concerning which they assume we ought to know something. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the adoption of the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the remaining Senate amendment. If there is any amendment that any gentleman wishes to take a separate vote on, I suggest we eliminate the rest of the amendments by agreeing to them.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the first amendment and concur in the same.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the House further insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 2, 5, 11, and 13.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendments Nos. 2, 5, 11, and 13.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 1.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a preferential motion that the House recede from its disagreement on Senate amendment No. 1 and concur in the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] moves that the House further insist on its disagreement with Senate amendment No. 1, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] makes a preferential motion that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 1 and concur in the same.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much time does the gentleman from Illinois wish?

Mr. CANNON. It is pretty difficult to tell. Quite a number of gentlemen have spoken to me about it. I certainly desire an hour, and perhaps more. I think we had best run a little while first and try out the hour.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think we had better have an agreement as to the time. I do not know that any gentleman——

Mr. CANNON. What does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suppose half an hour on a side would be sufficient.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I think an hour and a half on this side ought to be allowed. I make the suggestion as a counter one.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not think we will be able to use it.

Mr. CANNON. Then we will vote.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Make it an hour on a side.

Mr. CANNON. From the number of gentlemen who have spoken to me, I think I shall be glad to use an hour and a half.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It might take half an hour to discuss the merits of this proposition. Can not the gentlemen print their other patriotic remarks in the RECORD?

Mr. MANN. The merits of this proposition involve patriotism.

Mr. CANNON. After all, I have some demands for time. If the gentleman thinks that he does not desire an hour and a half, I propose an hour upon his side and an hour and a half upon this.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Make it an hour and a quarter.

Mr. CANNON. An hour and a quarter upon a side?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on the pending Senate amendment and on the various motions be limited to two hours and a half—one-half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and one-half by myself—and that at the conclusion of the debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent that the debate on amendment No. 1 be limited to two hours and a half—half of the time to be controlled by himself and half by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]—and that at the end of the two hours and a half the previous question shall be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is recognized for one hour and a quarter and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] for one hour and a quarter.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suggest that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] use some of his time.

The SPEAKER. If nobody wants to speak, the Chair will put the question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I suppose if there is any merit in the preferential motion of the gentleman from Illinois he will be able to state what it is. I do not know it myself. I do not like to debate something until I know what I am to discuss.

Mr. CANNON. I fear it will be exceedingly difficult for myself and perhaps others to inform the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], who seems to know and does know a great deal about a great many things——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am willing to explain what this desecration proposes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the Lincoln Memorial was authorized with a limit of cost of $2,000,000. There was a commission appointed. Upon that commission as its chairman was the then President, Mr. Taft—and he is still its chairman; the present Speaker of the House; Gov. McCall, then a Member of the House; the Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. Wetmore; Senator Cullom; Senator Money; and myself. We proceeded after a pretty thorough consultation with the Fine Arts Commission, headed at that time by Mr. Burnham, since deceased, who was the architect for the present terminal railway building in this city, and I think stands among American architects, or did stand during his lifetime, with St. Gaudens as a sculptor, and I do not speak less for other architects or less for other sculptors when I mention Burnham upon the one hand and St. Gaudens upon the other. Much attention was given, first, to the site, but I will not go into that very fully. The site was selected. We were not a unit on that question. The Speaker of the House, as I recollect, preferred one site and I preferred another. We were a minority, in disagreeing upon the Potomac Park site, of two. I desired the Soldiers' Home site, on an axis with the Capitol at North Capitol Street.

We "tenderfeet" do not always get what we think we desire and perhaps ought not to have our way in matters of art, and as it is not very material in the consideration of this question I will not take much time to say it; but let me say that, looking through the hindsight, I am inclined to think the Art Commission and the majority of the Memorial Commission located this memorial where it ought to be located [applause], although I was somewhat worked up at the time. There it is, just across from Arlington, on the Potomac River; a beautiful park, the Potomac Park, as it is, and as it is to be. I will not take time to describe what it is to be when in the fullness of time it is finished, but I am very glad that there has been a design for that park and for its extension. I am very glad that the park was rendered possible by producing the elevation you have there, the plaza, by hydraulic process from the river, because the tide ebbed and flowed over that park for many years after I came to Washington.

After much of investigation, on the recommendation of the Arts Commission, urgently voiced by Mr. Burnham, who was then its chairman, we selected the architect, Mr. Bacon. Upon that Arts Commission was Daniel C. French, an eminent sculptor. After full investigation, we let the contract. Mind you, the limit of cost was $2,000,000. After full advertisement there were various bids received, all of them, I believe, within the limit of cost, as I recollect it, except two. The dispute was about the material. One bid, for the use of Colorado Yule marble, was for $2,147,000, in round figures. The same contractor made a bid for the use of Georgia Amacolola marble at $2,046,000, in round figures. The Amacolola marble bid was lower by $111,000. The other bids, as I recollect them, were all within the limit of cost. I soon discovered that the Fine Arts Commission, the architect, the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, and the Memorial Commission, substantially, with the exception of myself, desired to use the Colorado Yule marble. I may state that the man who bid on the Colorado Yule also bid on the Georgia Amacolola marble, and perhaps on another, which was believed to be an inferior marble, and which I think brought it within the limit of cost.

Well, I guess I had some of the notions a man is apt to have who has served as long as I did as a member and as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that the garment ought to be cut according to the cloth, so for one I objected. However, there was power vested in the commission to make minor changes in these bids, and the commission proceeded to make what they called minor changes, and they turned out to be in reality minor changes, because after contest they were held to be minor changes, as I recollect, first by the Executive, and since that time payments have been made settling the accounts of the contractors by the officers of the Treasury.

The minor changes which the commission proceeded to make were as follows:

1. Substitution of cement for bronze ceiling beams in the building. By making that change or modification the cost was reduced $70,000.

2. Elimination of retaining walls. By omitting retaining walls the reduction of cost was $87,000. I give it in round figures.

3. By a modification in the joining of columns, reducing the height of the drums, there was a saving made of $10,000.

4. By reducing the floor slabs from 6 to 2 inches in thickness, a saving was made of $6,000. There was a reduction also in the bronze screens.

The total reduction was $192,000. The total cost of the memorial under existing contracts was $1,975,000, and the contract was let.

I believed then, and, while I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet, and while I might not be standing here advocating this appropriation, I believe now that somebody would stand here and advocate this appropriation, although, as an individual, I would prefer a different course. But all the experts and architects and members of the Arts Commission and substantially all the Memorial Commission except myself and, I believe, the Speaker, although I am not sure as to that, believed that this Colorado Yule marble is the best marble on earth. I have no doubt of it from all the evidence we got. Still I thought perhaps the Georgia marble would be good enough. That is marble that comes from the quarries from which the marble came for the statue of Columbus, which rests in front of the Union Station Building.

Now, this contract did not include the steps.

Mr. MADDEN. Leading from the terrace?

Mr. CANNON. Yes. Let me state that the building under the contract can be, and will be, completed within the limit of the contract, even if this appropriation is withheld. The amount asked for the completion as originally let, and the approaches that were not let and which were not a part of the memorial, and the larger part of the steps, is to bring the cost, if this appropriation and authorization are made, from $2,000,000 to $2,594,000.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question in that connection?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Do you believe that even if this appropriation is made the work is now advanced so far and all conditions are so well known that it can be stated with some degree of certainty that it will be completed, then, for $2,594,000?

Mr. CANNON. I have no doubt it will be. I have the estimates here in detail.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit one question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does not the gentleman think that these steps, which he has shown there in the picture, would serve a very useful purpose if completed in accordance with the desire of the commission?

Mr. CANNON. I have no doubt. Absolutely, from every art standpoint, for harmony with the surroundings, and from every other standpoint—I was going to say patriotic as well as the art standpoint—the appropriation should be made.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question, to see whether my understanding is correct?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. These steps that are now referred to and provided for were not considered as included in the original estimate of $2,000,000, were they?

Mr. CANNON. They were not. I was going to state that.

Mr. MANN. As I understand it, those steps are absolutely essential to get up to the Lincoln Monument at all?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Were they not a part of the original design?

Mr. CANNON. They were not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have on my desk a photograph furnished to me long before the design was actually agreed upon by the committee. It was furnished to me by Mr. Henry Bacon, the architect. The gentleman does not mean that this was considered a complete design, 40 feet up in the air?

Mr. CANNON. I mean to say that, right or wrong, the contract was let for the building, and, as I will show presently, it did not include these steps, 400 feet over all, and then the next tier of steps, 300 feet over all, perhaps.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is, the contracts as let did not include them, but they were a part of the design submitted by Mr. Bacon as a part of this memorial.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman looked at the picture, did he not, to see how it would look when completed?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; and I talked with Mr. Bacon.

Mr. CANNON. Well, but Mr. Bacon did not let the contract.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know he did not.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Bacon made the design. Nor did the contract include the trees that were to be planted about the memorial, nor the grass, nor the landscaping, which will, no doubt, cost a very considerable sum of money. In fact, no doubt something has been expended already in the landscaping and in the improvement of Potomac Park, not under these appropriations, nor under the jurisdiction of the commission, for that matter.

I have already given you the modifications that were made. Nor did the contract include the electric wiring; nor the decorative painting on the walls and ceiling, $50,000; nor the masonry approaches, $237,000.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Does not the gentleman think electric wiring and decorating of the walls really ought to be part of the cost?

Mr. CANNON. Whether they ought to be or not, I will be entirely frank, as a tenderfoot, and say that I did not know whether it included electric wiring or not; but it did not include electric wiring, as I am reliably informed, nor did it include the decorations on the walls. It did include the bronze beams. It did not include the bronze screens that are to inclose the hall. It did, as I recolleet, provide for the pillars inside and outside, and the superstructure.

Now, the amount that was deducted to secure the marble was $172,500; but since that time the price of labor has largely increased. The price of the bronze has increased, the price of the granite to face the terrace walls has increased, so that where there was a reduction of $172,000, which was taken from the bids, it will cost $263,000 to replace that which was reduced.

The balance of the $594,000 is for the granite walls.

In addition to the general decoration, the walls and ceilings will include two large paintings 12 feet high and 60 feet long over a large tablet bearing Lincoln's second inaugural and the Gettysburg address, illustrating in allegory those subjects. The masonry approaches were not included in the original design; however, they are a necessary means of access to the memorial from the park level and designed to be in harmony with the building as well as the park surrounding it. They approach the building from the Washington Monument side and will be constructed of granite, and are in two parts. The first section is 400 feet wide over all by 177 feet in length; it contains 30 steps rising 16 feet.

Gentlemen will notice that here are the steps that lead up to it. Here is to be a granite wall all around the building, and you journey down toward the level on these steps spoken of here.

There is to be a driveway around the memorial 100 feet wide.

The earth mound surrounding the memorial will be 1,000 feet in diameter. Its first terrace will be raised 11 feet above the park level and planted with trees at the outer edge, leaving a center plateau 755 feet in diameter, which is greater than the length of the Capitol. In the center of this plateau will rise a rectangular stone terrace wall 15 feet high, 280 feet long, and 156 feet wide. On this rectangular terrace rises the memorial. The entire height of the memorial will be 125 feet.

Bronze beams above the halls in which rests the statue are to be cement unless this appropriation is made. The screens which are to close in the hall in inclement weather when necessary are to be bronze if this appropriation is made. If the appropriation and authorization is made you can get to this monument, and if it is not made I suppose you would have to go up in an aeroplane.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The height to which the memorial is now erected is in accordance with the original plan?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The additional steps have not been made necessary by increasing the elevation?

Mr. CANNON. Not at all; from the plaza to the top of the memorial complete is 125 feet. I wonder how many gentlemen have been down and looked at it as the work progresses.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The reason I asked the question is because I have looked at it, and it looks very high. It may not look so high when the mound is completed.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. I think when the work is completed the gentlemen from Minnesota will be entirely satisfied with it. Of course the Washington Monument is much higher. I doubted, as a tenderfoot, whether this memorial would not be dwarfed by the Washington Monument, but I have become satisfied, since I have seen the work progress, that it will not be dwarfed by the Monument. While I have not seen many of the wonderful buildings of the world, I am inclined to think that this memorial when completed will be the greatest memorial building in the world. [Applause.] If it will not be it ought to be.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does not the gentleman think from long experience on this commission that we ought to substitute bronze for cement in these beams?

Mr. CANNON. I have no doubt about it, and we ought to have the bronze screens.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman understands that the beams can be made with cement and covered with bronze?

Mr. CANNON. Precisely.

Mr. MADDEN. And that they will be just as good in a utilitarian sense as if they were solid bronze, and will last as long?

Mr. CANNON. Well, the gentleman says "last as long"; I do not know how that may be, but I believe that my friend and myself in the distant ages when this great memorial is standing, we will be wearing asbestos or muslin halos. [Laughter.]

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I will.

Mr. GILLETT. Was this design selected by competition, or was the architect selected?

Mr. CANNON. The architect was selected.

Mr. GILLETT. There was no competition?

Mr. CANNON. No competition as to the architect; he was selected by unanimous consent on the recommendation of the Arts Commission, and especially of Mr. Burnham. If I were erecting the building myself and building a building of this kind, I would have the matters that were cut out to enable the commission to get the Colorado Yule marble, in harmony with the original design. In other words, it ought to correspond.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee). The gentleman from Illinois has used 36 minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, my excuse for participating in this debate is that I am one of the commissioners appointed to build this Lincoln Memorial. It is with extreme regret that I differ with the very able chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. FITZGERALD, and as a usual thing I am with him. We all wish that this splendid memorial could have been completed within the appropriation, but it can not be finished properly within that limit.

I have always been very liberal in the selection of objects and men for admiration on my part. There are four Presidents who, in my judgment, for all time to come will stand in a company by themselves—George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, and Abraham Lincoln. In his preface to his wonderful life of Charles the Twelfth of Sweden, Voltaire speaks of certain men "rising above the vulgar level of the great." That is one of the most suggestive phrases that was ever coined in the teeming brain of its wonderful author. He speaks of kings, emperors, princes, potentates, generals, whom their contemporaries deemed great, but who, tried by the severe test of time, fade away and sink into nothing. But these four Presidents, two of them Democrats and two of them not Democrats, have left their impress upon this Nation and upon the world as no other American statesmen have done. Most assuredly these four "rise above the vulgar level of the great." Washington has a very unique monument, which challenges the admiration and attention of every person who visits this wonderful city. We have undertaken to build Abraham Lincoln one that will do the same for the visitors to this city. If I had my way about it, I would have one built in this city to Jefferson and one to Andrew Jackson. Every once in a while the Fine Arts Commission takes a notion to remove Jackson's Statue from the center of Lafayette Park, but they will not do it as long as I am a Member of the House of Representatives. [Applause.]

I am proud of the fact that Abraham Lincoln was born in Kentucky. He is a Kentuckian, he is an American; but what is a great deal more than that, he is a world figure and belongs to the ages. Instead of his fame diminishing as the years steal into centuries, it constantly increases, and he ought to have a monument, if he is going to have one at all, in every way worthy of him. Having started in upon it, I am in favor of making it the most beautiful monument in the world. Of course, it is going to cost some money, but to spoil that magnificent structure by substituting cement for bronze is absolutely preposterous. [Applause.] There can not be two notions about that. I would not have had it located where it is if I could have had my way, and neither would Mr. Speaker CANNON. He wanted it put out at the Soldiers' Home and I wanted it put on Meridian Hill. I wanted it set on a hill where it might be seen of all men, and I think yet that it should have been so located. But we were overruled, and it is located where it is. We are not honoring Abraham Lincoln by building a monument to perpetuate his fame; we are honoring ourselves, and we are reflecting the sentiment of the whole American people.

When Abraham Lincoln died he was intensely popular in the North, and, though some people may not know it, as the years go by he becomes more and more popular in the South as well as in the North. The southern people came to the conclusion long ago that if he had lived they never would have experienced one-half of the calamities that grew out of the Civil War, and I believe that also. He was one of the greatest Americans. He is one of the greatest men who ever lived in the history of the human race, and he, more perhaps than any other President, typifies the average American citizen in his life and character. [Applause.] These things being true, Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of voting this money to complete that monument in the way in which it ought to be completed. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, we are discussing this afternoon, not for the first time, the Lincoln Memorial. For a decade, yes, for a longer period than that here in the National Capital, and throughout the Union, in the North and in the South, loyal citizens have been discussing the construction here in the Capital of this great Nation of a suitable monument to the memory of Abraham Lincoln. Ten years ago this very site was suggested. Four years ago this commission was named, and one of the interesting things connected with this discussion here to-day is that the only Member of the House of Representatives whose public career extends back to the old Lincoln days, who knew Lincoln personally and well, Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, is here, in the full strength of his manly vigor, to advocate a suitable memorial to the memory of his friend; and may he be spared to the State he represents and to the Nation he serves so well in full health and vigor for many years to come. [Applause.]

This memorial was not hurriedly decided upon by this commission. The men appointed by the original act creating the commission were William H. Taft; Shelby M. Cullom, of Illinois, now gone to his reward, contemporaneous with Lincoln, speaker of the Illinois House of Representatives when Lincoln was President of the United States; George Peabody Wetmore; Samuel Walker McCall; Hernando D. Money; and the distinguished Missourian who is now the Speaker of the House of Representatives. After the death of Senator Cullom, of Illinois, a distinguished southerner was appointed in his place, Gen. Joseph C. S. Blackburn, of Kentucky. Every member of this great commission agrees to these recommendations—they are unanimous—and that of itself ought to be a potent argument here and in States we represent.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. That is very interesting history the gentleman has given, but how has it any bearing on the question of these extras?

Mr. RAINEY. I will come to that presently. A number of plans were suggested, each one of them having reference to the particular locality then under consideration.

A great architect furnished plans for the erection of a memorial on the Soldiers' Home grounds; another on Meridian Hill, overlooking the Capital City. Another prepared plans for the erection of the memorial where it is now being constructed; and to a great American architect, Henry Bacon, was finally awarded the contract for preparing the plans under which the memorial is now being constructed. This building is located where I think it ought to be located, with the Capitol at one end of a long axis extending west for perhaps 2 miles, extending through the Grant Memorial, and then farther on through the Washington Monument, and then, just under the shadow of the hill upon which is erected the mansion in which Robert E. Lee lived prior to the Civil War, the site has been selected, a position dominating a wide area of undeveloped land. If this memorial is properly constructed, with proper terraces, with proper approaches, it will never be dominated by any other building in that section of the city. The memorial itself is to stand upon an elevation artificially created, the same kind of an elevation as was artificially created for the Washington Monument, arising just as high above the valley. The elevation above the level of the valley there is to be 45 feet. First, a great terrace a thousand feet long, upon which is to be planted four rows of trees; then, rising above that, another eminence 16 feet high, supported by a terrace wall, and on that second eminence this magnificent memorial is being constructed. The Egyptians spent no man knows how many years of time in erecting memorials to their kings, and their kings were buried in the center of those great pyramids. We are building here on this elevation a memorial which ought to stand as long as this Republic stands [applause], and this Republic ought to stand as long as the pyramids have stood in order to accomplish its mission in the world. We are not building for this fiscal year nor for the next fiscal year. On the first terrace—and that is part of this additional expense—is to be planted, as I have stated, four rows of trees. Those trees will not reach their maturity during the life of any Member of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, could I ask the gentleman to give me five minutes more?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes additional to the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RAINEY. In the center of this memorial is to stand the statue of Lincoln, here where the North and South meet, the statue of the man who in his first inaugural said, before war had broken out on the longest battle line the world had ever known, speaking for the North then as well as for the South:

> We are not enemies, but friends. We must not be enemies.

And to-day, half a century after the close of the war, more than half a century after the death of this great American, here under the shadow of Arlington, surrounded by an amphitheater of the hills of the Southland, we are building this memorial. On one side of the central chamber, in which is to be placed the statue of the martyred President, will be a memorial hall, which will contain the Gettysburg address; on the other side another memorial hall containing his second inaugural address. The building itself is being built within this appropriation. The plans for a building never contemplate the grounds, the grading, the walks, drives, the parking, and the planting of trees, and this additional appropriation is in large part asked for the purpose of furnishing a proper setting for this great memorial structure, for the purpose of preparing the walls of these memorial chambers for decorations and for suitable mural paintings, historical in their character. The additional sum requested provides also for the approaches to the building. Since the monument was contemplated originally and since the plans were agreed upon there has been an increase in the price of labor and an increase in the price of material. The bronze beams will cost more now than then——

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I do.

Mr. GORDON. An increase in the price of labor and material would not affect contracts if such increase has occurred since the contracts were made.

Mr. RAINEY. It affects the cost under the plans approved by the commission. I do not believe the gentleman from Ohio wants to dwarf this Lincoln Memorial, that is to last through all the centuries. I do not believe the gentleman can afford to vote against a proper setting for this memorial to Abraham Lincoln and go back and attempt to explain his position to his district. [Applause.] The gentleman would not want to do that. So far as I am concerned, he can do it and explain his attitude to his constituents. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. A good argument that is.

Mr. RAINEY. The terrace wall will cost more than originally contemplated. The bronze screen between the entrance columns will cost more. The increased cost of these items, due to the rise in the price of labor and material, will amount to something like $172,000. The balance of the amount we are asked to authorize to-day is made up of necessary items not included in the original contract—electric wiring and fixtures. Does any gentleman want this building to be erected there without any method of illuminating it in the nighttime or on a dark day? The decorative paintings on the walls and upon the ceiling of this magnificent memorial building will cost $50,000. Does any gentleman object to the decorating of these walls with proper historical paintings? The masonry approaches to the memorial will cost $237,000. Does any gentleman want this memorial to be constructed without these approaches? These are items which make necessary the additional cost of this building that we are not building for to-day or next week or for this fiscal year, but for all time. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, Congress intended that there should be erected to the memory of Abraham Lincoln a memorial that would command the respect and the admiration of civilized men the world over. To enable such a memorial to be constructed it created a commission of distinguished public men and provided that there should be expended the sum of $2,000,000, a sum nowhere rivaled in any action that Congress had theretofore taken for memorials. It was intended that this sum should provide a complete memorial, and the act was so framed and construed that when the memorial was completed everything would have been provided that was essential. When the bill that passed the House on February 7, 1911, was under consideration, Mr. McCall, who had charge of the bill, stated that he would consider it as meaning that the commission was to provide for a memorial of a very imposing character, and—

That we might contemplate providing plans for a memorial that would cost $2,000,000, including the site and all other accessories.

The site was furnished by the Government in addition to the $2,000,000. So the money available for the memorial was not encroached upon by expenditures for a site.

The character of this memorial when it was adopted by the commission was well understood. Its essential features were clear, and the commission knew just what was essential in order to complete the memorial. Here is a picture which shows the memorial, with all of the accessories which have been spoken of to-day, taken from a model before the design was even accepted by the commission, and furnished to me by Mr. Henry Bacon, the architect who has designed the memorial. Gentlemen in advocating concurring in the Senate amendment say that the contracts did not include provision for a bronze ceiling nor for the steps to the terrace, nor for the electric wiring, nor for the mural painting, to cost $50,000. They did not, although the members of the commission knew that they were letting those contracts to take practically the entire $2,000,000, and were failing to make provision for things deemed essential by the man who had designed the memorial.

I indulged in prophecy the day this bill was before the House in 1911. I sometimes do. I said then:

My experience has been that whenever Congress authorizes any public improvement or memorial or public work of any character and fixed in advance the limit of cost, it has never been able to obtain skilled services of architects or other artistic services resulting in the design for the building, memorial, or an enterprise that could possibly be built within the limit of cost fixed by Congress. If this $2,000,000 be inserted here, I am confident that a plan will be prepared for some memorial which, although it will be stated it will not cost $2,000,000, will never be completed with perhaps $3,000,000, or, at least, half a million dollars more than the proposed cost.

The commission is now asking $594,000 in addition to the $2,000,000 already provided and in addition to a site given over by the Government.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman having prophesied that this memorial would never be completed for less than $2,500,000, why does he complain that we make him a true prophet? [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. They have gone beyond that sum. I shall state before I finish why I am complaining, Mr. Speaker.

Gentlemen on that side of the House for the past year or two have seemed to take particular delight in quoting for political partisan advantage some remarks made by me within the past year or two relative to the alleged extravagance of Congress. They have never quoted all that I said. At that time the principal feature of my remarks was that a handful of Democrats were continually joining with the solid Republican side of the House to pile up the public expenditures for the embarrassment of the Democratic Party. They will repeat the performance to-day.

Who was at the head of this commission that has been guilty of the indefensible and unjustifiable action of approving a plan for a memorial and making contracts, knowing that they could not complete the memorial within the limit of cost fixed by Congress? He is a former President of the United States, who has been engaged more or less continuously in traveling about the country saying and in his restful moments writing unjustifiable criticisms of the Democratic Party as an incompetent body in the management of the Government. Yet after his long service in public life, filling important positions in the gift of his party, as the head of this commission he sets an example that would be absolutely destructive of all governmental services and agencies if followed by Democratic officials in the departments.

Who is the next leading member of the commission? A worthy successor to that former President, if by any possibility the gods should decree that he should become President of the United States, and who has recently announced his candidacy as the Republican candidate, the honorable Samuel Walker McCall, governor of Massachusetts, who probably believes that his action on this commission equips him admirably to fill the high office of President because he has demonstrated his contempt for the law enacted by the Congress of the United States.

I know that the distinguished former Speaker of the House and the present Speaker of the House are in one of those embarrassing positions that public men sometimes find themselves in and are doing the best they can under the circumstances. They were both against this scheme. They did not believe in this plan. They believed that one of the other plans proposed for a memorial to commemorate the memory of Abraham Lincoln should have been adopted; but the other gentlemen, showing their contempt for representatives on the commission taken from the House of Representatives who are elected by the people, overrode them on all occasions and put them in this embarrassing position.

Why, Mr. Speaker, is this memorial cost to be more than the amount authorized by Congress? Because the cost of labor has increased? Oh, no. Because they thought of something afterwards? Oh, no. One of the important reasons is that the former President, to whom I referred, insisted that one particular kind of marble should be used to the exclusion of any other—Colorado yule marble. I undertake to say that there are not two Members of the House that can look at a building and tell whether it is Colorado yule marble or Georgia marble. This is not the only instance in which that former President has been guilty of such conduct. All have heard or read of the history of the public building at New Haven, Conn. It is said the cost of that building was increased from $800,000 to $1,400,000 as one of the reasons for inducing President Taft to approve the public-building bill of 1913. He persuaded the Treasury officials, after he had retired to the quiet and hallowed precincts of Yale University, to select Tennessee marble for that building in preference to Vermont marble, at an additional expenditure of $165,000—all, all in the interest of economy!

Mr. Speaker, we are not building a flimsy, temporary structure to the memory of Abraham Lincoln. We are spending $2,000,000 upon it, and it will last and endure as long as anything that man can construct will endure. Col. Harts, who is the Army officer who is the executive of this commission and secretary of the Fine Arts Commission, stated that with the money now available a complete memorial would be erected; that the retaining wall was not an essential feature; that there were no essential features, he stated, eliminated from this memorial. If those additional features were to be provided, they could be provided at a later date, with comparatively no increased cost, with one exception; and that is, instead of putting in a bronze ceiling, it is proposed to put in a cement ceiling and color it with bronze paint, and that would be a difficult matter to remove.

This commission ought to go out of business. After it is out of business, if Congress should determine that it wanted those additional steps and wanted the retaining wall, that work should be put in charge of men who will observe and obey the law.

What does this appropriation of $594,000 mean? The Architects' Trust has had its hand in it. For years we had been paying for outside architectural services 5 per cent, and then the Architects' Trust, which recently was busy on another matter, arbitrarily raised the price to 6 per cent, so that the architect on this structure, under the present limit of cost, receives 6 per cent on $2,000,000, or $120,000. There is no incentive upon those men to design buildings within the limit of cost, because if this particular provision be adopted the architect receives out of it $30,000 additional as his percentage on the $594,000 to be provided.

It was supposed that the great galaxy of statesmen upon this commission would have some interest in protecting the Treasury of the United States. Many believe that an appropriate and a suitable memorial that would not only have done justice to the memory of Abraham Lincoln but would have commanded the respect of the United States and the admiration of all the world could well have been built, even if the site had also been paid for, with $2,000,000. But, absolutely disregarding the law, in contempt of the law-making body of the United States, the commission proceeded according to their own will, relying upon patriotic appeals in the name of Abraham Lincoln to have their illegal action justified.

This House should not desecrate the memory of Abraham Lincoln by ratifying their action. If this were to be an incomplete memorial, if it were to be one that would not do justice to the memory of Lincoln, if it were one where additional money were required in order to make it a suitable and fitting memorial, we might with regret approve what they have done. But it will not be either incomplete or unsuitable. We should not desecrate the memory of Abraham Lincoln by appealing to the love that men have in their hearts for his great work in behalf of the Republic to justify the action that has been taken by this commission.

To my colleagues upon this side of the House I desire to say that I appreciate the appeal that is made to them. I know that some of them are placed, perhaps, in a position that may be embarrassing because of the fact that they represent the State from which Lincoln came. I know also of the purpose of a united and solidified Republicanism appealing for a few votes upon this side of the House in order to obtain this unjustifiable expenditure of $594,000. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to. I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it is very easy for my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to criticize a commission because it has gone beyond the limit of the law in reference to appropriations, and I would not refer to what I now propose to refer to if my friend from New York had not so severely criticized the commission, the most conspicuous member of which, outside, possibly, of the ex-President and the Speaker of this House, is my colleague, Mr. CANNON.

The gentleman from New York and myself were on a commission in charge of the House Office Building, and the very bill that we have before us contains a provision for maintenance, including miscellaneous items and for all necessary services, $2,500 for the House Office Building, a deficiency incurred in direct conflict with law [applause on the Republican side], because it was our duty on the commission to see that the maintenance and the services and the miscellaneous items in the House Office Building came within the appropriations heretofore made. But the convenience of you gentlemen required that some extra services and expenditures should be incurred, and we authorized them and trusted to you to make the appropriation which has been made, so far, without a dissenting voice. And so it is with all commissions. I want to say this to the gentlemen of the House: I do not know whether this Lincoln Memorial Commission is subject to criticism or not. Most of the items which this bill, by amendments, proposes to authorize are absolutely essential. You can not do without the stairway, which is the most expensive of the items. You can not do without the walk and the steps. You can not do without the retaining wall. Those items must be provided for eventually. I would not do without the bronze ceiling in favor of cement any more than I would take away the beautiful ceiling over our heads, which cost more than mere cement or plain glass. [Applause.]

I said when this bill was before the House originally for passage that some day this great country of ours, with its Capitol here and its wonderful dome, with the Mall reaching down, with the Washington Monument, and on, beyond, this memorial to Abraham Lincoln, and on, beyond, there would be a bridge crossing the Potomac River, which so long divided the North and the South in war, over to the home of Robert E. Lee, Arlington, the National Cemetery, and then from there would lead a road down to the home of the Father of His Country at Mount Vernon; and some day this great Government of ours, in the loving tenderness of forgiveness and forgetfulness, would reach on with a road leading from the Capital of the United States to the capital of the old Confederate States, and that at the other end of that road—Richmond—some day there would be erected a monument to the man whom the South most loved and revered—in modern days, at least—Jefferson Davis, the President of the Confederate States. [Applause.]

Perhaps we have not reached the time yet when the North is quite willing to do that. I am glad to know that when this bill was before the House for the erection of this Lincoln Memorial the southern Members, forgetting the feelings of the Civil War and the strife, voted almost unanimously for the great tribute which we are seeking to pay to the memory of Abraham Lincoln. [Applause.] And while the gentleman from New York is seeking to say that on our side we will be united and we want a few votes on the Democratic side, I appeal confidently to the patriotism and to the love of the southern Members of Congress to make this tribute to Abraham Lincoln the most beautiful monument constructed to the memory of any man anywhere in the world. [Applause.]

If you do not do it, your tribute to Abraham Lincoln, frequently repeated here, is mere lip service. I think we can afford to pay to Lincoln this tribute. I think we can afford to give to his memory the finest monumental structure which can be erected; and if the architects could find something else which would make it more beautiful than they now plan, I should favor it. Abraham Lincoln, tall, ungainly, homely, ugly, his heart and his memory, his deeds and his love, deserve to have as their monument the beauty of the ages—something in direct contrast with his face but along the lines of his heart. [Applause.] Let us make it the conspicuous thing in all the land, our tribute to the great lover of mankind, Abraham Lincoln. [Applause.]

Mr FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I deeply regret that what I shall call the attention of the House to at this time should occur upon a memorial to the great Lincoln, but I do not know of a better occasion to attract the attention of Members of this House who are at least inclined in some measure to protect the Treasury in this country from the system recently grown up in awarding contracts by the Government.

In the first place, upon this particular memorial there was an award of a contract to the Yule Granite Co., of Colorado, which entailed an additional cost upon this memorial of $111,000 to start with. That amount of money was practically thrown to the four winds of the earth. I have heard gentlemen say here that this will be an enduring memorial to the great Lincoln. I am afraid that before many years elapse somebody will come into Congress to get an appropriation for the repair of this great memorial. The one great public building in the United States in which Yule marble has been used is the Denver (Colo.) post office, and I have been reliably informed that since the exposure of the marble to the atmospherical conditions the face of that magnificent building in Denver is cracked from top to bottom. It is an inferior marble to the marble that was in direct competition with this, to wit, the Amaicolola marble of Georgia.

Now, I have not got any marble industry in my district, and I am not speaking from a mercenary standpoint. I heard the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] this morning paying a great tribute on this floor to this Fine Arts Commission. If I had my way, I would abolish the Fine Arts Commission in two minutes, and I have introduced a bill to do it. It is a menace to economy, instead of a help, in the erection of buildings in this beautiful city. For instance, take the post-office building over here. Former Secretary MacVeagh, in awarding a contract for that building, threw away $56,000 of the public money. When it came down to the last analysis of his reason for throwing that money away he told me that there was a slight difference in the color between the granite used in the post-office building and the granite used in the Union Station. I replied: "Mr. Secretary, do you think that anyone after five years could tell the difference in the color of the stone used in the two buildings, whether it was built of Georgia or Vermont granite?" He had to admit that that was true. And yet this Fine Arts Commission, with absolute power to act, caring not a picayune about the condition of the Treasury or the cost involved, goes around here and recommends a certain sort of material and is backed up by the hifalutin experts that spend the people's money like water. I am not going to vote for the increase asked for, because it is an inexcusable extravagance. I admit that I regret to do it, but we are relying upon Col. Harts in this matter. He is a practical man; he is in charge; and he says that the memorial can be completed within the $2,000,000 appropriation; that it will not impair the beauty or the permanency of this memorial if it should be completed within the appropriation.

Mr. CANNON Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Col. Harts is one of the most ardent advocates of this appropriation that there is.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes; he is, like all experts, in favor of anything that will conform to his personal views and that will take money out of the Federal Treasury and increase the burdens of the people of this country. I am not surprised at Col. Harts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee). The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

[Mr. HOWARD had leave to extend his remarks.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that my heart was ever more engaged in any enterprise undertaken on the floor of this House since I have been a Member than it was in support of the effort to have this wonderful, beautiful design of the Lincoln Memorial adopted. I presume I am as typical a southerner as any man who ever served in this House, perhaps as any man who ever will serve. My life has been spent on the southern border of the Gulf States. I was ardently in favor of paying proper tribute to the character and achievements of that great southern man, Abraham Lincoln. [Applause.] He was a pacificator, although director of a war, and whose services to my section of the country would have been of incalculable value had he been spared. I worked in season and out of season for that design, because I wanted a memorial erected in this city so commanding and so magnificent that it would harmonize with and exemplify his great character, and I think such a design was adopted.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am like my friend from Georgia, Mr. HOWARD, and these other gentlemen, some of whom are opposing and some of whom, like the gentleman from Georgia, do not yet know whether they are opposing this appropriation. I was always afraid that there would be an appeal for more money. I believe that the amount appropriated originally was quite adequate to build a magnificent monument, one perhaps that did not cost as much as some of the great memorials of the Old World, as, for example, that to Victor Emmanuel in Rome, but which for beauty, for esthetic value, far exceeds it.

I was afraid that this appeal would be made, and I ventured to suggest to the gentlemen of the commission that every step should be taken to guard the expenditures and to avoid the necessity for coming back for more money. That has happened which I expected, but I do not believe that the Fine Arts Commission, inveighed against by my friend from Georgia, is responsible for this. Those gentlemen are notoriously unsafe advisers in matters of detail in the way of busineses and expenditures. Their minds are so absorbed with the development of the esthetic side of these schemes that they scorn to give attention to or to recognize the obligation of respecting limits in appropriation bills. They are a little difficult to deal with. I admire them in their line; they are exceedingly useful there, and I would not have the Fine Arts Commission abolished for any consideration. I think it is going to have a very great and useful part in the development of the beauty of the Capital City of this country, which can not be made too beautiful for my taste. But as chairman of the Committee on the Library in the last four years—now nearly five—I have had some experience with them. I find them almost regardless of the obligations of contracts. They seem to think it unnecessary to live up to the specifications of the law in such matters. Time and time again, as has been illustrated down here in the Grant Monument and in the pediment that is to go up on the Capitol at this end of the building, they have come in and said calmly, "We must have more time." And, being already committed to the designs, already having paid out considerable sums of money on their execution, what can we do but accept the terms that they dictate? The trouble is that we have not been particular enough ourselves to live up to the very letter of the law of appropriations. Of course this appropriation will pass. It is impossible to resist the eloquent appeal made by the distinguished and venerable statesman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], another southern man, by the way, I am proud to say—oh, yes, we made large contributions to the civilization of Illinois when we sent Lincoln and CANNON there. [Applause.] It is impossible to make an appeal for the protection of the Treasury which will stand against such eloquence; but, as a rebuke to commissions, as a rebuke to artists who have no regard for their obligations, I think we may very well withhold the appropriation on this occasion.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN].

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, it so happens that I was not a member of the subcommittee which considered this item in this bill, and neither did I have the privilege of being present at the meeting of the full committee when the item was considered. I had been summoned home on account of a death in my family. I have asked for these few minutes to-day particularly to say to this House that if I had had the opportunity I would proudly have voted for this amendment. [Applause.] I do not like to hear so much about the South when a proposition of this sort is before the Congress, and neither do I like to hear so much eloquence on my side of the aisle coming from distinguished Representatives from the Southland, for whom I have the utmost regard and respect, when a monument to the memory of Abraham Lincoln is being considered; nor do I like to have the honesty and character of men like those who comprise this commission questioned on this floor. It so happens that the distinguished first citizen of my own State—not a member of my political party—the present governor, Hon. Samuel W. McCall, was a member of this commission. I never knew him to do a dishonest act. It may be that he will be the next first citizen of this land; and as a Representative of the old Bay State, despite my loyalty to my own party, I would never hang my head if Sam McCall were President of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.] Parenthetically, I would say that I would like to see that applause just a little stronger over on that side of the aisle. [Laughter and loud applause.]

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Surely.

Mr. GORDON. Is the gentleman a member of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Does the gentleman know anything about these extras that he is talking about?

Mr. GALLIVAN. I hope so—probably as much as the gentleman from Ohio ever knows about what he talks about. [Laughter.] Mr. Speaker, we are talking about a monument to a man who was born 107 years ago last Saturday in a rude cabin in Kentucky, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] has told us, destined to complete the work begun by Washington and to write his name indelibly on the history of mankind. He was born into a poverty that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] and others who now preach economy can scarcely understand, and into conditions that gave little presage of the splendid career of patriotism and statesmanship, sacrifice and solid worth his life accomplished, and if it were not for men like Lincoln the gentleman would not be a Member of the Congress of the United States in this day and year. [Applause.] Yet we hesitate at two hundred and fifty additional thousand dollars to complete a monument to his memory. In my judgment, thirty millions of dollars would not memorialize what Abraham Lincoln accomplished for this, the greatest country under the stars! [Applause.]

Out of a youth full of penury and unremitting toil, amid the rude and illiterate conditions of a hard frontier life, the boy plucked the rudiments of education. This self-taught backwoodsman was the incarnation of the American idea; strong and sound in body and mind, his simplicity and sanity, his honesty and courage, his humanity and humor, his charity and democracy were irresistible in refuting sophistry, unmasking falsehood, assailing wrong, and in bringing home to the American people the vigor and virtue of the basic principles of free government. [Applause.]

His splendid warning to the American people that slave and free could not exist together in a government of freemen sank into the minds of the North; his declaration that slavery was inherently wrong appealed to their hearts and consciences; and his masterly series of addresses which led up to his nomination and election to the Presidency nerved the free States to meet the inevitable struggle which the preservation of the Union and the destruction of slavery involved. Abraham Lincoln's splendid patience and tolerance of his foes and critics, his invincible optimism and faith in the success of the cause of union and freedom, his unbounding charity and unfaltering persistence during the dark days of rebellion inspired the hearts and strengthened the courage of the Nation and brought victory to the Republic. In a large measure his work was done when he was stricken by the madman's bullet; the work that was done after him showed the lack of his guiding hand and broad humanity, and those whom the assassin hoped to help were the largest sufferers by his foul deed.

Lincoln passed into the company of the immortals at his death; his fame has broadened with the years into the very corners of the earth and is imperishable; his genuine greatness is acknowledged and unquestioned in every quarter of the globe; and he stands with Washington as one of the two greatest figures in the history of the American Republic. Washington found his country 13 dependent Colonies and transformed them into a federation of free, independent United States; Lincoln found the United States a jarring congress of Commonwealths, suspicious and intolerant of each other, faithless to the Constitution, the Declaration of Independence, and the principles of freedom, and when he died he left a united country and a Nation of freemen. [Applause.]

The Republic to-day all over its broad area honors this maker of a Nation, the liberator, Abraham Lincoln; and to-day we recall his life and utterances and his fidelity to the high principles of liberty, humanity, equality, and the common brotherhood of man—principles that in this age are more honored in the breach than the observance. [Great applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I subscribe, as I am sure everyone else does, most heartily to the beautiful tribute which was paid by our leader to the memory of Abraham Lincoln, but I deny that a vote upon this question is any test of either a man's patriotism or of his admiration and reverence for that great man. [Applause.]

I yield to no man in my respect for his memory, but I feel it my duty to vote against this proposition. [Applause.] I do not think anyone pretends that the memorials we build to our national heroes are at all commensurate with their services for us. I do not think anyone pretends that the amount of money we vote for a memorial measures at all our gratitude. No money could measure that. We only decide what is a fair, liberal amount to build a memorial. If $2,000,000 had not been thought enough, I would gladly have voted originally for any additional amount; but when Congress has once fixed it, I do not want any Executive authority to try to increase it. Congress decided that $2,000,000 would build a beautiful and fitting tribute to one of our greatest Presidents.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. No; I will not until I get through. I have only five minutes——

Mr. STAFFORD. There is plenty of time on the other side and the gentleman can have it.

Mr. GILLETT. If I am given the time, I will answer the gentleman's question. Now, Mr. Speaker, we had every reason to expect, at least I expected, when this commission was appointed, consisting of some of the most distinguished citizens of this country, that for once, for once, the executive body would carry out the will of Congress. We are constantly criticizing here—I believe the Appropriations Committee feel it more than others—but we are constantly criticizing the executive tendency not to abide by the will of Congress in appropriations. When an appropriation is passed for some object the executive departments always seem to be striving to exceed the appropriations, striving to make some plan by which they can come before us and compel us to further what they desire. It is not peculiar to this or any administration. I believe the most flagrant instance of it in Washington is our present Agricultural Department Building. It is an executive tendency and Congress always is enraged by it, as we have the right to be. When this commission was appointed I thought at last we had a commission that would conform to the will of Congress. I appreciate what our distinguished ex-Speaker said, and I appreciate the delicacy of his position. I venture to say that if he had had the running of that commission a beautiful and satisfactory memorial would have been built, with all of its accessories, within the $2,000,000. Some of my most intimate friends are upon this commission and yet I am mortified by their conduct. I think from the beginning it was obvious from what our ex-Speaker said that there was an expectation that they would come before us for an increased appropriation. Now they ought to have done one of two things. They ought, as he said, to have cut the garment according to the cloth, or they ought originally to have come back to Congress and said that they could not construct such a memorial as we wished for that money and they wanted more, and undoubtedly Congress would have given more if necessary, but for them to go on and commit us to a plan and then come back and claim that they can not complete it within the appropriation is most censurable.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GILLETT. Can the gentleman from New York give me two or three minutes more?

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 30 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. GILLETT. I will try not to use all of that time. Now, what is the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts argue in favor of an unfinished memorial to the greatest American?

Mr. GILLETT. Indeed I do not.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the proposition before the House to-day.

Mr. GILLETT. Now, that is where the gentleman is mistaken. He is a member of the Committee on Appropriations and ought to have read the hearings.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have read every word of them through.

Mr. GILLETT. Col. Harts stated that under the present appropriation we can have a finished memorial.

Mr. STAFFORD. Finished without the steps or terraces or——

Mr. GILLETT. The steps were not in the original plan, as Mr. CANNON told us.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have heard that same statement made several times. It is true, is it not, that Col. Harts said that for that amount of money we can have a memorial?

Mr. GILLETT. He said a finished memorial.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. There is a great difference between simply using the article "a" and using the expression "suitable" memorial for Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman read what he said?

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit me to read what he said? I have it here—

Col. HARTS. They are [referring to the steps], however, essential to furnish access to the building, which was raised 45 feet above the surrounding park.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, we all know that is not true. We all know they were not in the original plan, and we know we do not need steps. We have no steps leading up to the Washington Monument, and that is way above the level of the park. You can have grading, grass, and walks, but you do not need a vast area of masonry. They were not in the original plan. It is very natural—architects, of course, are always——

Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. GILLETT. No; I thank you.

Mr. MANN. I will do the same thing some time.

Mr. GILLETT. Wait until I finish this—architects are always urging extra expenses, and, of course, it is to their self-interest to do so. They get a commission of 6 per cent. The architect will get $35,000 more if we give this additional appropriation. The commission ought not, in my opinion, to allow the architect these extras, after they themselves have said they were not necessary and adopted a different plan. But I admit there were some features of this that are essential, and I condemn this commission for omitting these features.

Electric wiring they did not provide for, or the painting on the walls. If it is necessary, they certainly ought to have been a part of the original proposition. It was left out for some reason or other, apparently because there were not funds enough.

Now, in my opinion, this commission should have done one or two things. They should have come back to Congress and asked us for an additional appropriation if necessary, or they should have changed their plans. Either one or the other would have been an honorable and straightforward course, and for one I am deeply disappointed and mortified by the action of this commission, a commission in which I had the greatest confidence, for whose members I have the highest personal regard. There is no executive encroachment which so provokes me as this custom of first getting an appropriation and then coming back to Congress and telling them it is necessary to have additional funds in order that the project may be completed. And for one, even when it is done by these eminent public men, I will not condone it by my vote.

Mr. CANNON. How much time have I, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 14 minutes remaining.

Mr. CANNON. How much has the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Twenty-five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest and very great concern to this discussion. I am a new Member of this House, but I am not new to the memory and traditions of Abraham Lincoln. I have often said that the two greatest characters, in my judgment, in this Republic, the two men who wrought more for humanity, the two men who left their footprints deepest in the sands of time to be witnessed by the coming ages were Thomas Jefferson and Abraham Lincoln. Thomas Jefferson, a child of education and refinement, wrote that solemn and undying truth, so far as this Republic is concerned, that "all men are created equal." Abraham Lincoln, coming from the cabin, in the common elements of life, wrought his own destiny, and with his pen put that declaration into life and living existence in the law of this Republic.

There may have been, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] stated, some kind of political jackals who are willing to rob the grave of a great man in order to get a grab into the Treasury. I do not believe it. But let that be as it may, I can not cure the past; and the only opportunity that I have now left to build a memorial in splendid commemoration to one of the great men of our Republic and one of the comets that passes along the centuries of ages, to glow among the stars and galaxy of life, is to vote for the appropriation for this monument. [Applause.] And I shall so vote. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield a minute to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE].

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, coming from the first State that called its sons to the colors to defend what they believed an invasion of their constitutional rights, the son of a Confederate soldier who followed the sacred stars and bars, loving the traditions of the South, yet I represent a people who learned with deep sorrow of the murderous hand that struck down the great President of these United States when he was called into the great beyond. Coming from a people who learned at the time of his death, in their daily life, of the great loss they had sustained, and coming from a people who are back in the Union to-day and want to be united with all parts of the Union [applause], I voice my own sentiments and the sentiments of my people in saying it will be a privilege and a pleasure to help make this Lincoln Memorial such a memorial as it should be, the most beautiful we can erect for the man who stood for so much in the trying days of the sixties. [Applause.]

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, it was a most appropriate thing for a previous Congress to authorize the erection at the National Capital of a memorial which would, so far as possible, fittingly convey to future generations the great service that Abraham Lincoln rendered to his country and to humanity. I come from a State nearly evenly divided in population between those who were born in the South and those who were born in the North. I believe that I correctly voice the sentiment of the people of Oklahoma, regardless of the place of birth, when I vote to enlarge the appropriation, hitherto authorized, for the erection of such monument. The evidence before the House is that the appropriation heretofore made is not sufficient to properly complete this memorial. So far as Lincoln is concerned, his fame is secure without the erection of this monument. We should, however, bear in mind that this memorial will commemorate the matchless service of one whose name shines with greater luster than any other name in the annals of American history since the days of Washington. A little over a half century ago in this city, the Capital of this great Nation, a deed was perpetrated that shocked the civilized world and plunged the Nation into mourning. The President of the United States, the preserver of the Union, the emancipator of a race, lay prostrate in death, the victim of an assassin's bullet. Thus, one of the greatest characters in all the world's history passed from the scenes of earthly conflict to his eternal reward.

Every mark of honor and respect was shown to the martyred President. In every possible way the people manifested their high appreciation of the services he had rendered the country; in every conceivable manner they indicated the irreparable loss the Nation had sustained in his death; and by every appropriate means they exhibited their great love and affection for him and their inexpressible grief and sorrow at his untimely and tragic death.

Appropriate funeral services were held throughout the country. The remains were brought to the Capitol and placed in the Rotunda; under its great Dome tens of thousands of people, with bowed heads, pallid faces, aching hearts, and tear-moistened cheeks beheld for the last time the lifeless form of Abraham Lincoln.

Fifty-one years have come and gone since Lincoln's great life went out, but Lincoln still lives in the hearts of his countrymen. The intervening years have augmented his fame, magnified his virtues, and glorified his character.

To think of Lincoln's career unavoidably reverts our minds to that awful cataclysm of civil war that convulsed this country from 1861 to 1865. In this mighty conflict the fabric of this Government was put to its severest test. Our national structure quivered, trembled, and rocked from turret to foundation. Our resources were taxed to the verge of exhaustion. Sectional strife, hatred, and bitterness swept this country with the force and fury of a tornado. For four long years the ominous clouds of war hung like a pall over this distracted land—causing the weak to despair, the strong to falter, the brave to fear, and the great to weep.

These were years of doubt, distrust, and fear—yet years of sublime faith, of rare fortitude, of superb courage, of great heroism, and genuine patriotism.

War stamped its impress upon everything. Business, trade, commerce, schools, churches, social life—all intermingled and blended with the bloody conflict in progress. In every home there were badges, tokens, and insignia of warfare. Every heart throb of the people—North and South—kept time with the martial music that was wafted upon every breeze.

For more than four long years Abraham Lincoln lived, moved, and had his being in this mighty maelstrom of war. The storm center of that great cyclone of contending military forces constantly hung over his head. He battled with its swiftest currents, he rode upon its highest billows, and upon his great heart, beat its greatest fury.

Through it all, Lincoln never faltered, never complained, never despaired. Supremely conscious of the justness of the cause which had been placed in his keeping, he remained serene, confident, hopeful, kind, and forgiving. He uttered no harsh word against the South, and on the 4th day of March, 1865, only a few weeks before he passed away, he stood on the east portico of this Capitol, near the spot where we now stand, and with perfect trust and candor, said:

> With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in; to bind up the Nation's wounds; to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow and his orphans; to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and a lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations.

Volumes have been written upon the life and public services of Abraham Lincoln. Authors, poets, and orators have extolled his deeds, recounted his achievements, and exalted his life and career. Renowned artists and sculptors have preserved his form and features upon canvas and in marble. States and municipalities have erected monuments to perpetuate his memory. Congress has recently authorized the expenditure of several millions of dollars to erect at the National Capital a magnificent memorial in his honor. All this is highly commendable.

Still all such efforts must largely fail. No person, no State, no nation, can construct, and no heart can conceive, a statue, a monument, a memorial that will give future generations a true conception of the service Lincoln rendered humanity. Our country is Lincoln's monument.

In his immortal Gettysburg speech he expressed the hope that—

> This Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom.

That prayer has been answered. War ceased. Sectional strife ended. Peace came. Our country was reunited. We became one people—one in thought, one in purpose, one in aspiration, one in destiny, and one in devotion to the flag. Our country had a new birth of freedom. It entered upon a new lease of life and power and greatness. When the Civil War closed we were a fourth-class power. We have risen to first place among the nations of the earth. We have become a great world power. In agriculture, in mining, in manufacturing, in internal commerce, in means of transportation, in communication, in wealth, and resources, we lead all other nations. We lead in education, in invention, and in intellectual achievements. We have attained great eminence in art, science, and literature. Many new States have been added to the Union. The flag floats over distant islands of the sea, and the Nation which Lincoln preserved is the greatest political power for good in the world.

> Our country, with its one hundred millions of free people, with all its wealth, power, and greatness, with all its splendid institutions that stand for progress, liberty, freedom, and justice, with all its power to advance, enlighten, and uplift humanity, this country stands a monument to the wisdom, statesmanship, and patriotism of Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, 43 years ago, at the other end of this Capitol, a great Senator from my State, in a most eloquent and patriotic speech, said, "Let us know one another better and we will love one another more." Since that time the wounds of separation have healed, the scars made by the war have gone, and a sympathetic and good feeling has come about between the sections. As a Nation we are now too great and too big for any section of this country to be swayed by bigotry, prejudice, or narrowmindedness.

The people of my State and section respect the appreciation that the people of the North have for those leaders and those men who followed the fortunes of the North in the trying period of this country's history, the same as I believe the people of the North respect the appreciation that the people of the South have for the leaders and the men who followed the varied fortunes of the South during that period. The names of Lincoln and Davis, Grant and Lee, Jackson and Thomas, reflect glory not on the North or the South, but on America, and the time will come when monuments to their memory will be found not only in the city of Washington but in the cities of both the North and the South. And to-day, coming from the very shadow of the home of that great patriot, statesman, and soldier, the President of the Confederacy, I feel that I breathe the spirit of that just man on this question when I look beyond the boundaries of the Mason and Dixon line and vote to concur in the Senate amendment. I believe it is what my people would have me do, and so I shall. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is pressed for time or not. I wish he would yield our side 10 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not pressed for time. Does the gentleman think he needs any more argument on that side?

Mr. MANN. Well, I really think that there are so many more arguments we can make that we ought to have them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak on this subject to-day; but sitting here, listening to the discussion, I could not help but feel a powerful inclination to utter a single plea in favor of the adoption of this amendment by this House.

I can not agree that this question involves the punishment of a commission or the questioning of the wisdom of the act of some body of men that have expended or obligated themselves to expend a little more money than the original appropriation required. I know of scarcely any case in which appropriations for any public or private enterprise are outlined and rigidly limited and then not exceeded when we wish to accomplish something that is good and strong and great. Feeling as I do, I want to recall to the Members of this House the fact that this is a rare opportunity for us to show the unity and the harmony of sentiment that prevails in our midst. Twice it has been my privilege in this House to rise and speak for unity and assist in the taking of an action that would indicate the possession of that sentiment. When a statute that inflicted a penalty upon men of the South, passed in the period of heat engendered by the war, was under consideration, though a Republican and from the North, I raised my voice and championed the passage of the act which removed that penalty and enabled distinguished people of the South to win back that which was their due. [Applause.]

When the contest was on this floor to compensate the Virginia Military Academy for its library that was destroyed in the war and for the instruments that perished then I again, because it was the honest sentiment of my soul, and wishing for a greater unity and harmony in my country, raised my voice and said:

> Yes; let us pass this appropriation and add another healing incident to wipe away anything that reminds us of discord and of strife.

Why, the time has passed for these older sentiments. I believe this House will almost unanimously say that upon this occasion and in memory of this great man, "We will vote the adoption of this amendment."

I simply add in conclusion: Recall, if you will, that splendid gem of literature that sparkles and glistens like a diamond, "The Perfect Tribute," it is called, written about this dead President, describing him when about to make and in the deliverance of his speech at Gettysburg. He struggled to prepare it and was dissatisfied because it seemed not to adequately express the kindness of his great soul, and when he had uttered it, after the famous oration of Edward Everett that was there delivered, he hung his head and said, "It is a failure." Walking the streets of Washington a day or two after, a boy ran into him as he went along with head bowed and his hands behind his back, and stopping, he said, "What is the trouble, my boy?" The boy said, "I wish to find a lawyer to write my brother's will; he is dying." And—but then you know the story that led the President to the bedside of the dying Virginian, where, after writing the will for this brave Confederate soldier, conversation turned upon the speech delivered at Gettysburg, when Lincoln said, sitting there unknown, "Oh, it seems to me it was a dismal failure; it was received in dead silence." "Oh, no," said that dying soldier; "it was a great success, and the fact that it was received in perfect silence was the perfect tribute to a perfect gem of speech." [Applause.] "Oh," he said, "if our people in the Southland could only know and feel what that expresses and know the sentiment to be the President's and that it was not only in the great heart of Lincoln but was growing in the whole North and would in time completely prevail, this war would cease, and the bitter strife of brethren would be stilled." [Applause.]

Let us make the silent monument perfect and give it as a perfect tribute to the greatest man of the century in which he lived.

America!

> Though passing brief the record of thine age,
> Thou hast a name that passeth all
> On history's broad page.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 14 minutes remaining.

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] four minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the time.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I really believe that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has been playing with the House [laughter], an opportunity having been given to gentlemen to say "Yea, yea," and "Nay, nay." I think he knew that when the time came to vote a very decided majority on his side of the House, as I believe, and a very decided majority of the minority side would vote for this amendment.

Having been a member of the Committee on Appropriations for 22 years and its chairman for 10 years, I know how strong the temptation is to insist that all things should be within the limit of cost. I have said, in substance, many times what the gentleman has said—not so well as he has said it, however.

Now, I am not going to apologize or to answer the strictures that were made by my colleague upon the committee [Mr. GILLETT] or by anyone else. I do not feel that I ought to be bound and tried and convicted for violating the law, or that his distinguished governor, Mr. McCall, ought to be, or that the gentleman from Mississippi, then Senator, Mr. Money, now dead, ought to be.

The truth is the law has not been violated, as claimed. That is the plain truth. The contract for this monument was let within the limit of cost. Is there any proof of that? If it had not been let within the limit of cost the accounts would not have been audited. There is a last guess about expenditures.

It is true that in order to use the Colorado Yule marble we dispensed with certain things that were in the original proposal. That is a thing that I did not approve of at the time, as perhaps I have said before to-day. We dispensed with the bronze ceiling and bronze screens, and the granite wall about the terrace, 13 feet on nearly 1,300 feet of terrace. But that was the action of the commission, and it was lawful, being such minor modifications as the commission had the power and the right to make. So that if the gentlemen were in earnest when they heaped coals of fire upon the head of my dead Senator, Mr. Cullom, on the ex-President, Mr. Taft, and the governor, Mr. McCall, and the Senator from Mississippi, Mr. Money, it is apt and proper that I should take this much of my short remaining time in replying to them.

Here is the picture that my friend from New York says was made and given to him. Yes; and that was not included in the contract. The contract extended from this point here so far as the steps were concerned. Now, the question is, Will you finish this building as it ought to be finished?

Now, as to the bronze ceiling and the bronze screens. I want them to be real bronze and not cement. [Applause.] In the fullness of time if, after this great memorial has dwelt in history, when all of us have been forgotten except a few great characters, it should be destroyed by accident or otherwise, I want the bronze ceiling to be there and not the bronze paint upon the ceiling.

Mr. Speaker, this is about all I want to say about the building. It is straight business, and, after all, there is sentiment in it.

Mr. GORDON. And that is about all there is in it.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, if my friend from Ohio had wisdom according to his interruptions, what a great man he would be. [Laughter.] But I will say that sentiment is always to be regarded if it be a good sentiment.

One day during my service a gentleman from Pennsylvania, whose acquaintance I made, came to me with a letter of introduction. I paid attention to him; we walked about the Capital and talked about the city. It was nothing like the city that has since grown up. He said, "What a magnificent Capital." "Yes," I said, "the greatest in the world." "Oh," said he, "I came with the First Pennsylvania Regiment that came down to Washington shortly after Sumter was fired upon. A comrade with me walking about the city came to the Capitol, and when we saw the beauty and the finish of this Capitol and its architecture, the magnificence of the size, my friend said with tears in his eyes, 'My God, I never realized before what this Government means. I am ready to die for it, and I will die gladly if it is necessary to save it.'" [Applause.] He did die to save it, and he died in a contest on the battle field, as this gentleman stated to me.

It is something in having a great Capitol, the highest grade of art, slighting nothing from any standpoint we are able to pay for. We ought not to slight work, we ought not to slight buildings or memorials. Our wealth is measured by two hundred billions of dollars. One-third of the world's wealth is in this country, and it has doubled since the census of 1900. I think we need not halt about making this expenditure from the standpoint of poverty.

I do not know that I desire to say anything further. I might talk about Lincoln, but it is not necessary. It is not necessary for this memorial, so far as it is concerned, to write him permanently in history. It is of more use to the present and coming generation; it can be of no use to Lincoln, because, as Stanton said when the breath of life left him on the morning he died, "He is with the ages now." [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

On January 24, 1916:

H. R. 320. An act to authorize the county of Bonner, Idaho, to construct a bridge across Pend Oreille River; and

H. R. 775. An act granting the consent of Congress to J. P. Jones and others to construct one or more bridges across the Chattahoochee River between the counties of Coweta and Carroll, in the State of Georgia.

On January 26, 1916:

H. R. 7611. An act authorizing the Seaboard Air Line Railway Co., a corporation, to construct and operate a bridge, and approaches thereto, across what is known as Back River, a part of the Savannah River, at a point between Jasper County, S. C., and Chatham County, Ga.

On January 28, 1916:

H. R. 4716. An act to authorize Dunklin County, Mo., and Clay County, Ark., to construct a bridge across St. Francis River; and

H. R. 6448. An act to authorize Butler and Dunklin Counties, Mo., to construct a bridge across St. Francis River.

On February 7, 1916:

H. R. 8235. An act to provide for the maintenance of the United States Section of the International High Commission.

On February 10, 1916:

H. R. 4954. An act directing the Secretary of War to reconvey a parcel of land to the Anshe Chesed Congregation, Vicksburg, Miss.

On February 15, 1916:

H. J. Res. 95. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to receive for instruction at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis Mr. Carlos Hevia y Reyes Gavilán, a citizen of Cuba;

H. J. Res. 98. Joint resolution making part of the appropriation, "Construction and machinery, increase of the Navy," in the naval act approved March 3, 1915, available for the extension of building ways and equipment at the navy yards at New York and Mare Island, Cal.;

H. J. Res. 146. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to loan, issue, or use quartermaster's and medical supplies for the relief of destitute persons in the districts overflowed by the Mississippi River and its tributaries;

H. R. 8233. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Republic Iron & Steel Co. to construct a bridge across the Mahoning River, in the State of Ohio; and

H. R. 9224. An act providing for an increase in number of midshipmen at the United States Naval Academy.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, we have talked about everything else but the question before the House. I want to call attention to the actual matter that is presented here for consideration. We are advised by the leader of the majority and by the leader of the minority on the Appropriations Committee that this additional expenditure ought not to be authorized. From the evidence before us it appears that some preceding Congress authorized the expenditure of not to exceed $2,000,000 to erect a memorial to Abraham Lincoln and donated the site. Some very eminent gentlemen have been named as members of this commission. I suppose, like most commissions, they are mere figureheads, and the architects, with a natural desire to increase their fees, as they receive 6 per cent on all extras as well as the contract price, have proposed to substitute another appropriation for the one made by Congress. The leaders on the Appropriations Committee, charged with very grave responsibility in Government expenditure of the public revenue, have told us that this ought not to be done. So far as I am concerned, I propose to vote with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] upon this question.

Of course, this has furnished an opportunity for a number of Members here to make speeches to circulate in their districts and to parade their patriotism before this House by showing their willingness to vote more money out of the Public Treasury. I would have more respect for their patriotism if they would come forward and donate some of their own funds to a worthy enterprise, rather than make these spread-eagle speeches to aid and assist in taking public money out of the Treasury, against the protests of the leaders on the committee. [Applause.]

I suppose a majority of this House will be scared into voting for this appropriation, for fear their patriotism or their respect for Abraham Lincoln may be called in question. So far as I am concerned, I will vote against it if I am the only one on the floor.

I want to pay my respects to the speeches and to enter my protest against the putrid patriotism that is always hauled out and paraded on the floor every time somebody wants to make a grab out of the Treasury. We are told by the responsible men on the committee that the present plans and specifications carry out the original intention of the House, and that this memorial can be erected within the appropriation and nothing will be absent, but that it will be entirely completed. I think it is time for this House to assert its dignity and, when it makes appropriations for a specific purpose, not to permit some architect or contractor to come back and drag more money out of it.

Why, we are establishing a precedent that will cost the people of this country untold money in the future. It has been said time and time again that this memorial can be completed as originally planned and authorized, according to the testimony by the leaders upon the Appropriation Committee. It is time this Congress put its heel upon that sort of thing, and a good opportunity would be to do it right now; and I undertake to assure you here and now that no man would show any disrespect to Abraham Lincoln or any lack of patriotism by voting against this $569,000. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, have I any time remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois has two minutes remaining and the gentleman from New York five.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HILLIARD].

Mr. HILLIARD. Mr. Speaker, the people of Denver, whom I have the honor to represent, know me to be a modest man, and they expect that I shall be properly modest down in Washington. Thus far I have not worried this House with any utterances of mine, and to-day I should not do so but for the fact that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] saw fit, upon information which he could not verify, to say that the most beautiful post-office building in the world, as seen in Denver, Colo., is cracking from the top to the bottom. [Laughter.] I wish to say that that building, constructed of the finest and strongest marble that God ever hid in the earth and that man ever dug up for his use, is a perfect structure in every particular. [Applause.] I know that men who come from other States where there is an inferior grade of marble [laughter] are jealous of that young giant of the West. The gentleman disclaims, as he says, that there is marble in his own district. I believe that; but if he were to assert here that there was an entire absence of concrete in his district he could provoke a wonderful argument. Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to say that I shall find pleasure in supporting the motion to concur in this appropriation. I believe that Abraham Lincoln accomplished that which no other man living or dead ever did or ever will; that while he was yet walking and on the earth he achieved that greatness which only comes to a man of whom no other great man is jealous. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, the question now before the House is to concur in Senate amendment No. 1 to the urgent deficiency bill providing that the limit of cost of the Lincoln Memorial shall be increased from $2,000,000 to $2,594,000. I shall vote against it. If I had been a Member of this House when the original appropriation of $2,000,000 was made, I would gladly have supported the appropriation; but now that the commission has not obeyed the original instruction of Congress but are wishing to go beyond it to the extent of $594,000 I shall follow the recommendation of the honored chairman of the Appropriation Committee, the gentleman from New York, Mr. FITZGERALD, and will vote to not concur in this Senate amendment.

Abraham Lincoln needs no marble monument to perpetuate his memory in the United States. We honor him because his life exemplifies the noblest principle of all, that of service to humanity. Mr. Speaker, a man may pile wealth upon wealth until the spire of his golden temple will reach the very heavens; he may add unto himself power again and again until millions will tremble at his very footfall; he may possess the gift of prophecy and understand all mysteries and all knowledge and yet find that his rainbow is but a momentary thing, and that the afterglows are but ashes while we gaze. There is but one light that the ages do not dim. It was seen in the burning bush which Moses saw upon the Mount of Horeb; it was witnessed by the children of Israel in the pillar of cloud by day and the pillar of fire by night; it drove away the Stygian darkness that enveloped the shepherds as they slept on the Judean hills and revealed to them the angelic host singing "Peace on earth and good will to men"; and it was none other than this light that fired the heart of Abraham Lincoln through the long and weary years of fratricidal strife. And to-day he is honored not because of the eminent position that he occupied but because of the spirit of sacrifice that his whole life reflected. There is no law that is more universally established in God Almighty's universe than the law of service. Go and ask the opening flower why it stands there and it will tell you that it stands there to sweeten the breath of man and show upon its every penciled leaf the handiwork of God. Go and ask the mighty oak that stands by the highway and it will tell you that it has stood there for more than a hundred years, and that it has spread out its brood branches in order that the flocks of the field might seek its shade. It will tell you that more than once it has received unto its body the lightning's bolt that would else have destroyed the traveler, and that finally when it falls it will fall by the hand of man and go into the ship that makes him the master of the seas.

Go and ask the mountain brook that comes down the side of the mountain like a ribbon of silver and it will tell you that it was born way up there where it could do no good, and so it hurried down, running where it could and leaping where it must, but always hurrying down, in order that it might quench the thirst of the shepherd's flock and finally spread out into a broad river and bear upon its bosom the commerce of the world. And thus, gentlemen of this House, the Master Builder of the universe has written upon every flower that blooms, upon every raindrop that swells the mighty river, upon every penciled shell that sleeps in the caverns of the deep, upon the very stars that light the path of the Milky Way, upon all of these He has written the universal law of service. [Applause.] And as a Member from the South I pay my tribute to the memory of the martyred President—the man who served—the kind and noble Lincoln; and before I close I want to thank the gentlemen on the other side for the tributes they have paid during this debate to the memories of Jefferson Davis and Robert E. Lee [applause], because "of all men who ever carved their names on fame they stand alone. Others have won honors because of their triumphs; they won honors from defeat and made failure glorious [applause]; vanquished they were, yet the victors. To honor virtue is to honor them, and to reverence wisdom is to do them reverence. [Applause.] In life they were a model to all who live, and in death they left a heritage to all. One such example is worth more to earth than all the stained triumphs of 10,000 Cæsars." [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All time has expired, and the question is——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and concur in the same, and upon that motion the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 257, nays 84, answered "present" 4, not voting 89, as follows:

On the vote:
Mr. FARR (for motion to concur) with Mr. HARDY (against).
Mr. LONGWORTH (for motion to concur) with Mr. EAGAN (against).

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was concurred in was laid on the table.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House agree to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes on the other amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair announces the following conferees: Mr. FITZGERALD, Mr. EAGAN, and Mr. CANNON.

Mr. MANN. I suppose it is by unanimous consent that the Chair named the conferees? I think it ought to be so stated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair by unanimous consent named the conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill.

CORRECTION IN REPORT.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the gentleman withhold that motion for just one moment, please? I wish to ask unanimous consent to change the figures in a report.

Mr. MOON. It depends on how long it is going to take you.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have the report (No. 183) that is filed on the bill H. R. 6456 apply to the bill H. R. 10312. There was a mistake in the number of the bill that the reports should accompany.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] asks unanimous consent to have a correction made on the report filed on the bill mentioned by him. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I do not quite understand what the proposition is. Would it not be better if the gentleman has a report that has an erroneous number on it to withdraw that and ask leave to file a new report?

Mr. CARAWAY. Possibly so. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the report on the bill H. R. 6456, with leave to refile it with the bill H. R. 10312.

Mr. MANN. You do not require leave.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] withdraws his request and asks unanimous consent to withdraw the report on the bill H. R. 6456, indicated by him. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10484, the Post Office appropriation bill, with Mr. RAINEY in the chair.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I want to address myself to the phase of the bill that refers to the rural carrier or the Rural Mail Service. I hesitate to speak on that theme in the manner in which I probably will be compelled to do, since what I say might be interpreted to be more of a criticism than an exposition of the question. I am one of the Members of the House among a great many others that would not criticize any service of the Government, no matter what party is in control, if the change is either for a justified economy or an efficiency that is unquestioned. The change that is proposed looking to a motorization of the rural service, transplanting the horse service, is put on these two bases, first, economy, and, second efficiency. If I were convinced that both of these or, at least, the last one, was subserved, I would not ask for a suspension of the order that has gone out. I speak with special reference to the change, because it has been ordered in my own home county, and affects my own home town, and in addition several other towns in every county in the district. And therefore, while I speak with special reference to my own community, I want to keep in mind the service at large rather than the manner in which it affects us.

In the first place, I do not believe that it will be economy, for when I laid the matter before the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General and told him that it could not possibly be made effective all the year round simply because the roads of our section of the State are not in condition to permit an automobile all the year, he said to me, "We do not intend to continue the service of the automobiles throughout the year, including the bad months of the year. We will have the automobile during the good months, and then we will have the horse carriage during the bad months." That means that the man who is to be the carrier, the owner of the automobile, will also have to have a service at certain times in the year by the horse. That would ultimately mean ownership of the automobile and also of the other method. I do not believe that that assures any economy to start with, but, even if it did, the other side, namely, the efficiency, is the serious point with me.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would like to inquire whether you will discuss the question of whether or not the horse could cover the road that was laid out for the automobile? As I understand it, the automobile has a route of 50 miles, and it was the opinion of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General that this route could be covered by a horse in any season of the year. Or would they have to have two horses?

Mr. FESS. They would have to have two horses.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And two carriers for one route?

Mr. FESS. They would have to have not less than two horses, and that would mean that the man who had the route in charge would have to have an automobile part of the year and at least two horses a certain part of the year, and a very uncertain part of the year.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Would it be possible to cover a road of 50 miles with a horse?

Mr. FESS. I do not think so. I did not get the idea from him that one horse would be used as the automobile would have to be displaced certain months.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understood he was to cover the same route with a horse that he covered with an automobile.

Mr. FESS. Two horses. One horse could not begin to do it. Now, in my district, in my own county, I asked for a statement of what the change would work in regard to the number of persons that would be served under the new method. I was told that there would be several persons greatly inconvenienced. Then a Democratic Senator from my State received the information that he made public, and made the statement that in my particular county there would be 31 families served that are not being served at the present time.

If nobody was deprived and, on the other hand, more were given service, I would be one of the men who would indorse the change; but I was not sure about that. Accordingly I sent for information, and here I have it definitely and specifically. Route A, out of Xenia, Ohio, will leave off 23 families that are now served. The numbers are given on each road and each way that the carrier travels. Route B will drop, under the new plan, 9 families. Route C will drop 12 families. Route D will drop 24 families. Route E will drop 6 families. Route F will drop 10 families. Route G will drop 11 families, and Route H will drop 23 families. A recapitulation of these several routes shows that 118 families will be dropped from the 10 routes that are now served.

I asked in explanation of this whether these persons were entirely deprived of the mail service. The answer came, "Not entirely deprived, but a change is made where some of them would have to go a distance of a mile and a half to get their mail."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman know how many additional families were accommodated?

Mr. FESS. Thirty-one, as Senator POMERENE stated the other day.

Mr. MOON. Has the gentleman made an application for a revision of those routes?

Mr. FESS. I have, and I received a promise that an inspector will be sent in.

Mr. MOON. No doubt that will be done. I understand, of course, that that is the purpose of the department. These inconveniences must occur on any revision, but it is the intention, I understand, to continue to revise until everybody is accommodated.

Mr. FESS. I know that the chairman of this great committee, for whom everybody has the very highest regard and esteem, is as absolutely sincere and earnest in having this trouble corrected as I am or any other Member of Congress and perhaps more so. The only thing that embarrasses me is that when we attack a change that ought not to be made we see in it what our Democratic colleagues says is not in it, and that is I think there is some political advantage that is being inaugurated here. I hesitate to say that, but there are some things in the change that look very much in that direction.

For example, here are two routes combined into one. They call that a "vacancy," and the vacancy is not to be filled by transfer. The rules of transfer will not permit, they say, to use one of the old carriers in the new route. Therefore you have produced out of two but one; you have dropped two and made a vacancy for somebody who is hardly eligible, a vacancy that can not be filled by one of the old route carriers. Past service seems to be a disqualification under this plan.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is always fair, and I want to be fair with the gentleman. Can he state what is the politics of the rural-route carriers who carried the mail heretofore on the routes?

Mr. FESS. Two out of Xenia are Democrats. I do not know what is the politics of the others. At least one of the three out of my own town is a Democrat.

Mr. COX. If those two are Democrats, the gentleman can not see any politics in the reorganization of the two routes.

Mr. FESS. There might be. They might be put in again. But what is to become of the other eight? In this matter I had not even inquired into the politics of the men.

Mr. COX. The gentleman is living in dread of what might happen in the future. Let us live in the present.

Mr. FESS. I think there is no one on the floor here who is more frank than the gentleman from Indiana, and I think he concedes my contention here, that probably that is one of the purposes in this rerouting.

Mr. COX. No; I never could concede that, for this reason: That it is bound to hit Democrats as well as Republicans if there are any Democrats carrying the mail now.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Foulke, of the gentleman's State, a former member of the Civil Service Commission, has made a statement that I have in my possession, to the effect that there are 43,716 rural carriers, and that this plan will really produce vacancies which will eliminate all of those people. This plan opens up to the spoils system an army of Government servants on an average salary of $1,089—over $43,000,000. Against this serious tendency, the Civil Service Commission has protested. Such regulation as would discriminate against these old carriers can have but one explanation. Now, I think there is not any doubt, I will say to my friend from Indiana, that that very fear is in the mind, not only of myself, but of himself, only it is not a fear in his mind as it is in my mind. The gentleman rather accepts it.

Mr. COX. Has the gentleman any evidence to that effect, or is it to him solely a fear that something is going to take place?

Mr. FESS. I heard the gentleman say some years ago on the floor of this House that something like 85 per cent of the carriers belong to one party, and that the civil-service law had not been observed as it ought to be in spirit; and I take it from what he said that there is going to be a change, to right what he claimed was a wrong, under this phase of the reorganization. I am putting it as I remember his statement.

Mr. COX. The gentleman understood me correctly, except that it was 95 per cent, as far as the State of Indiana was concerned. I am a little bit leery and worried for fear that my fear has been delayed too long by the department.

Mr. FESS. I think that is a very frank statement. There has come into my mind the thought that the department, instead of working for efficiency and economy, as so loudly proclaimed, is working for a policy of motorizing not the routes but the carriers. This is what I have charged. If it is true, it can not be justified on the mere assertion of Members of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON. I will yield the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. GRIEST. I yield the gentleman one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. FESS. I thank the gentlemen. I wanted the extra time simply to finish a statement that I started to make a moment ago. If it is efficiency, and we can prove it, I have no further contention. But I am sure it can not be that. One hundred and twenty families inconvenienced is wrong. Any change should be for the better—not for the worse. Think of compelling a man who wishes to send a parcel or a registered letter or a money order to go a mile and a half to do it. This is not to be tolerated, if it can be avoided. Then, on the other hand, if it is economy, I have some contention on that score, for I do not believe that this body ought to begin to economize or retrench in the Rural Mail Service. It is the service that has the direct relationship of the town, the country, and the farmer to the Government, and it is the only kind of Government service that the people are paying for directly. It is probably the only kind where, as I am served, I pay for it—not in the full sense, it is true, because it has not been altogether self-supporting. I believe that this House—every Member of it, without regard to party—would say that we should not economize to the point of making inefficient the services of the mail matter. [Applause.] If economy is needed, let us begin it in some other line; but let us not in the interest of economy go to the extent of depriving the people, the rural community, of efficient mail service in a time when they need it most.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. MOON. If the department, by doubling the length of the route, having one carrier instead of two, can give as good and efficient service to the public as they did when they had two, would it not be good policy to do it?

Mr. FESS. I am rather inclined to say, if the gentleman's premises are correct, that I would agree with him.

Mr. MOON. That can be done where the roads are good and can not be done where the roads are bad.

Mr. FESS. I think that can be done where the roads are good.

Mr. MOON. And in order to do this they must experiment to some extent, and I suppose in some cases the experiment does not work out well.

Mr. FESS. It has not worked out well in our section.

Mr MOON. After having experimented in the economy and not accomplished the result, the experiment must go further, in order to readjust the routes, on the old basis or some other basis, so as to give the people good service. Is not that correct?

Mr. FESS. I suppose so.

Mr. MOON. That is all the department is doing.

Mr. FESS. I think we have gone far enough already to prove that it is absolutely impossible to make an efficient service with the motors; and therefore, as far as I am concerned, I want to protest against going further than what has already been done. Some of our people have already attempted the motors before the law would require it, and they simply could not do it even on the short route. It has been tried in my district, and my county has good roads.

Mr. MOON. It may not have worked well in the gentleman's case, but in many cases it has.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. I want to say that in my district an old soldier had been a rural mail carrier for 11 years. He carried the mail every day; never missed a day on account of sickness. He had the best record of any carrier in that town. The routes were readjusted, and, although, his route was not changed at all, another carrier from another route was put on, a young man designated to take the place, and the old gentleman was dropped entirely from the service. After about two months of experiment it was discovered that the experiment was a failure, and now the old soldier asks to be reinstated. He is told that he can not be reinstated, but a young man who is a Democrat has been appointed to succeed him. Does the gentleman think that that is in the interest of efficient service?

Mr. FESS. No; I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

[Mr. FESS had leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. FESS. I herein submit the following resolutions from my district:

Whereas it has come to our notice through the press and through the official notices from the Post Office Department that on March 31, 1916, the present rural routes out of Cedarville, Ohio, will be discontinued; that such change will make it impossible for some of our patrons to receive their city and county daily and weekly papers until nearly 24 hours after publication, much against the wishes and desires of the patrons: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the rural free delivery patrons of the Cedarville, Ohio post office now assembled at the annual farmers' institute, do hereby go on record in opposition to the proposed plan, in that we desire to receive our mail through our local post office in Cedarville, the center of our commercial, social, religious, and educational activities; and be it further

Resolved, That said routes as now planned will not give us the service we had in the past, as many of our patrons will not be able to get the mail on their own premises, and that the great majority of the patrons will not receive their mail until late in the day; and be it further

Resolved, That the routes as now planned will not permit the use of automobiles over much of the road during the winter season, as experienced by the present drivers, who have not been able to cover their routes of 25 miles a day by automobiles owing to these conditions. Thus through the present plan of additional 25 miles or more it makes the proposed routes impracticable in this community; and be it further

Resolved, That this institute heartily favors and indorses any plan that will be the means of having our mail distributed through our local post office which will insure the same satisfactory service we have enjoyed in the past; and be it further

Resolved, That the Post Office Department send an inspector into this section before the 1st of April that conditions may be investigated as to the feasibility of the proposed routes; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be forwarded to our Senators, Hon. ATLEE POMERENE and Hon. WARREN G. HARDING, and Congressman S. D. FESS, respectively, to be filed with the Post Office Department, and ask that they use their best efforts in behalf of the rural free delivery patrons of the Cedarville post office toward the relief prayed for in these resolutions.

President Farmers' Institute.
J. OLIVER JOBE,

BELLE CENTER, OHIO, February 5, 1916.

Hon. S. D. FESS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The annual session of the farmers' institute just held in our town unanimously adopted the following resolution:

"Realizing that efficient rural mail-delivery service as now in force is without doubt of more value to the farmer than any other department of Government work, we therefore oppose all legislation tending to change the service from its present efficiency by motorization, as proposed by the department."

Hoping you will use your influence in opposing the present plan to motorize all routes, and thanking you in advance for the same, I remain,

Yours, truly,

J. M. LIGGITT.

URBANA, OHIO, January 29, 1916.

Hon. S. D. FESS.

DEAR SIR: Our grange went on record as being opposed to the bill consolidating the rural mail routes and using motor vehicles instead of horse and wagon.

Our country roads are impassable for automobiles at this time of year, and they would not be practical for mail routes.

I have been authorized to ask you to use your influence against the bill.

The horse and wagon are giving good satisfaction.

Yours, truly,

[SEAL.] L. H. BARGER, Secretary.

I also submit the following petition, signed by 94 bona fide voters in Greene County:

Hon. S. D. FESS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The undersigned residents of Spring Valley and vicinity, desiring to emphatically express our disapproval of the contemplated changes in the rural routes of Greene County, do hereby petition you to use your influence in every possible way to prevent the post-office authorities from making such changes.

We wish to remind you that such changes would result in the most unjust and unfair discrimination in favor of the larger towns and cities against the smaller towns and rural communities. These smaller towns and rural districts form the backbone of our great country, whose people boast of a government of the people, for the people, and by the people, while we are drifting toward a government of the cities, for the cities, and by the cities.

We wish to protest against any policy or legislation that favors the cities against the rural districts, and we trust and expect you as a representative of our interests to give our request your earnest and active support.

XENIA, OHIO, February 3, 1916.

Hon. S. D. FESS.

DEAR SIR: We, the members of Greene County Pomona Grange, urge you to do all in your power to retain the present rural mail routes as they are, and by unanimous vote beg to offer the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the present system of rural mail delivery is very efficient and satisfactory, and we emphatically denounce the proposed lengthening of the Greene County rural routes."

C. C. GRAFF,
ALBERT BURRELL,

Representative from Ohio, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We hereby certify that the inclosed petition is an exact copy of the original petition that we have placed on file in the office of S. A. Burleson, Postmaster General, Post Office Department, Washington, D. C.

We request your support in this matter, and thanking you for the favor.

CEDARVILLE, OHIO, February 5, 1916.

S. D. FESS, Esq.
Representative from Ohio, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned citizens and business men of Cedarville, Ohio, respectfully enter our earnest protest against the proposed change in the Rural Delivery Service as it affects Cedarville for the following reasons:

First. It will be detrimental to our town as a trade center. In this respect it will affect every business interest as well as our social and intellectual interests.

Second. It will greatly inconvenience our citizens and business men in communicating with friends and patrons. At present we can reach them in an hour or so; under the new system it will take at least 24 hours or more for mail to reach friends within one-half mile of town.

Third. The proposed change will be detrimental to community interest in every way, and, so far as we can see, will add nothing in the way of economy or efficiency to the service.

Therefore we respectfully ask that the order changing the rural delivery system at Cedarville, effective April 1, be rescinded.

THE RURAL-ROUTE BLUNDER.

This motorization of the Rural Mail Service looks very much the usual style of Democratic blundering in the matter of conducting the business of the Government. Instead of being an improvement, the loud complaints from those interested show that it promises to be a backward step in the matter of rural service of the mails to the farmers.

With executive ability of such Postmaster Generals as John Wannamaker and under the Presidencies of Roosevelt and Taft the Post Office Department had arrived at a degree of efficiency that spelled almost perfection. Now we find a disposition to inaugurate changes that instead of being better are promising to be much worse, and to the great inconvenience of the people. Thus it has ever been under Democratic rule in this country—abolishing competent conditions and introducing experiments, which have always proven inefficiency.

If the Post Office Department wanted to do something for the real improvement of the rural mail routes of Greene County, why did it not leave the routes as they are, and simply inaugurate the service by motors, so as to give more prompt delivery of mail to the farmers, with the provision that in bad weather the present vehicles could be used instead of the motors. With a little additional pay to the carriers for the upkeep of the motors, this would have been satisfactory all around, instead of upsetting the whole system of rural delivery, as has now been done.

In the single matter of requiring a change of the post-office address of, say, persons who from time immemorial have been getting their mail at, say, Jamestown or Cedarville, but now requiring having to be addressed at Xenia, is a condition that is absurd and distasteful and highly displeasing to hundreds of people. And, of course, the same nonsensical and unreasonable and unsatisfactory condition applies all over the country, wherever the Government is thus attempting to disarrange the Rural Mail Service in this way.

Then, again, think of the hundreds of persons who have heretofore been getting their mail right at their front doors, who will now be required to go long distances to reach their mail boxes, often in bad weather, and you can imagine the mutterings of dissatisfaction that will be vented upon the department. Some of these trips have often necessarily to be made by children, whose safety will be feared. It is simply too bad.

As to the saving in expense, as claimed by the department, many think there is nothing in it, on account of the increased pay that is to be allowed to the motor carriers, but even if a few dollars is saved it is at the expense of discommoding a large class of people. Is this wise?

When a great Government undertakes to serve its citizens it is unseemly to attempt to do it in a niggardly manner. That is not the reputation which Uncle Sam has always had. But we have fallen upon Democratic days, and we suppose we must take our medicine until we can make a change.

MIAMI COUNTY FARMERS READY TO FIGHT AGAINST MOTOR RURAL CARRIERS—ASSERT NEW PLAN WILL BE COMPLETE FAILURE BECAUSE OF MUDDY ROADS.

A widespread feeling that only needs a leader to kindle into flame of general protest lurks in the hearts of Miami County farmers, aroused and angered by the proposed change in the Rural Mail Service. Motorization of mail routes may be pleasing news to automobile manufacturers and Democrat Party leaders, who, under the guise of bettering the mail service, plan to snatch the positions of Republicans now in the public service and give them to Democrats, but it is not pleasing news to the rank and file of the country's populace.

The Rural Mail Service has been built up by years of careful study and arduous labors. It has not reached a stage of perfection, but those who are served by it do not think the service will be bettered by removing the number of carriers from service and replacing horse-drawn vehicles by automobiles, which at their best are never reliable.

The consideration of the proposed change is not local to any one spot in the county, but it comes from all sections. From the environs of Bradford, Troy, Covington, and the vicinity of Piqua come complaints.

As a prominent Miami County farmer said last week, "the Democrats are planning to disconnect us from the world for 24 hours; they will make our mail a day later."

"Can you imagine a person traveling 50 or 60 miles over the roads in Miami County as they are to-day and making the trip in one day?" said another farmer. "On almost any road you take you will find abandoned wagons and in several places automobiles that are stuck deep down in the mud," he continued.

It is a significant fact that not one of the present six rural mail carriers out of Piqua took the examination to become motor carriers. They know the plan is not feasible—that it will be a failure. They travel the roads to be traveled every day. One of the carriers recently said, "An automobile could not get over my route in two days, let alone one day."

The Postmaster General has been smart enough not to make the change in the dead of winter, when the roads are the worst. Instead, he plans to make the change late in the spring, when the roads will be passable again. The greatest discomfiture will not be caused until next winter. By that time the Post Office Department hopes that the farmers will have forgotten about horse-drawn vehicles.

Here is what United States Senator WARREN G. HARDING, of Ohio, has to say on the matter:

"Apparently," said he, "a very considerable part of the reorganization of the rural service that is going on is designed for the purpose of ousting Republicans and putting Democrats in their places. It never will be accomplished without a thorough airing of all of the purposes behind the plan."

The 13 Ohio Republican Members of the House are starting the ball rolling in the lower branch of Congress by drafting a resolution, which is now ready for introduction, calling upon the House Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to investigate the alleged prostitution of the rural service to political purposes. The plan is to spring the resolution in the House and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration, and, if that is refused, to force a vote on a motion to take the resolution up, thus placing Members on record. Several other Republican State delegations are reported to be ready to join Ohio in this insurrectionary movement.

The following resolution, backed by the solid Republican membership of Congress from Ohio, has been introduced in the House by Representative ROSCOE MCCULLOCH, of the sixteenth district:

"Resolved, That the House instruct the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department to investigate at its earliest convenience the purposes and probable results of the proposed motorization of the Rural Mail Service."

[From the Cedarville Herald.]

WILL OPPOSE ANY CHANGE.

That the people of this community, as well as the other towns in the county who are interested in the proposed rural free delivery changes, will oppose the Post Office Department plan is certain. So dissatisfied are the patrons that no effort will be spared to check the change or know the reason why.

If we were to view the situation from a political standpoint entirely we should say that the Republicans have nothing to lose and the administration in power would be held responsible, and neither the tariff, prohibition, woman's suffrage, preparedness, nor any other political issue will keep the outraged patrons, irrespective of political views, from voting solidly against the return of the present administration.

But there is more than politics in this question, and that is the inconvenience of a service that will affect rural free delivery patrons each day. Men who have been lifelong Democrats openly declare their refusal to again support the party if their postal rights are to be turned over to some other post office than their home town.

The claim of the department is the enforcement of economy, but no account seems to have been taken of the service to the public or whether the plan can be worked out in this community. Anyone familiar with the proposed routes is convinced at once that the plan is not practicable in that the carriers now require about 7 hours for 25 miles over roads where it is impossible to send an automobile.

If the department had centered the three routes in two and started them from this place there might be some chance for decent service, and even then during the winter months this would have been impossible.

The business interests here will feel the change keenly if it is allowed to be put in operation. It will mean the diversion of business belonging here into other channels. No longer can the patrons call their local merchant and have some article sent on the morning mail. It would, under the new plan, have to be sent the day before.

The interests of all our people are at stake, and not particularly Republicans or Democrats. The Democratic administration is responsible for the change; it will be this administration that will pay the price in November, 1916, and Democratic voters on the three routes are going to do their part on that day.

[From the Piqua Daily Call.]

READJUSTING RURAL MAIL DELIVERY.

The Post Office Department is said to be getting many complaints about readjustment of rural mail routes. The Government is trying to extend the service still further without increasing costs. That means rearranging the routes so as to take in more territory. It will be a problem to meet all the conflicting demands from localities and patrons.

When the service first started carriers got only about $300 a year. Now they have become an important body with political influence, and are usually paid about $1,200 a year. As they have to furnish their own teams or automobiles, this may not be too much. But with the tendency of Government jobs to be soft, the department should see to it that it gets a fair and reasonable day's work in every case.

It must be enormously difficult for men in an office at Washington to sit down at their desks and arrange everything in a practical way. A route may look perfectly good on the map, but it may be composed of roads so rough or hilly as to be impracticable.

No one wants to be at the tail end of a route and unable to get his mail until late in the day. Few people like to receive their mail from a route running out of some distant post office, as they have to give their correspondents an address previously unknown, which causes confusion. This also is often unpopular for reasons of sentiment.

If the carrier starts on his work early, he misses newspapers and mails that he ought to deliver. If he starts late, the patrons grumble at the delay. To the man sitting at the desk in Washington this conflict of interests must seem impossible to reconcile.

The patrons should keep in mind the enormous cost of the service and be careful not to ask too much. It is, of course, desirable for business reasons that a farmer should get his mail in season to answer important letters the same day. But in most cases this is not vital. Even if the lonely farm house does not get its newspapers and mail until the evening lamp is lighted, the Government is still rendering it a wonderful and incomparable service.

The Troy (Ohio) Daily News of January 13 prints the following under a Washington date line:

Charging that the extensive reorganization of the rural-route service in Ohio, with substitution of motor routes for horse-drawn vehicle service, is a grand scheme to get Republicans out of their jobs and to appoint Democrats in their places, Representative SIMEON D. FESS will go before the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to-morrow to protest against proposed route changes in his district. The doctor intends to do some plain talking. "Democratic office seekers have at last found a way to pry open the Rural Mail Service," said the doctor, "and having burgled their way into the civil service they are eligible after one year for transfer into the clerk or carrier service of post offices or into the Railway Mail Service. The discovery of the way to do this comes just in time to reward deserving Democrats just prior to the presidential campaign."

[From the Xenia Daily Gazette.]

WAR DECLARED ON ADMINISTRATION'S POST-OFFICE POLICY.

WASHINGTON, February 5.

War has been declared on the administration's conduct of the Post Office Department by nearly a hundred Members of the House. Before the administration gets its supply of money for the conduct of the department for the next fiscal year, there is promised some oratorical and political fireworks in Congress, with set pieces to demonstrate that Postmaster General Burleson and his aids have failed to maintain the Postal Service and have cut down the efficiency of the mails in order to make an economy record.

The men in Congress who represent the real "peepul," the men from the districts where the agricultural population predominates, are the leaders of the movement against the department. They are rampant in their demands for a change in post-office methods, and they particularly denounce the conduct of the Rural Free Delivery Service.

In their search for means of cutting down expenditures, the efficiency experts of the administration in the Post Office Department hit upon the Rural Free Delivery Service as one of the most available places to begin pruning. Reorganization was decided upon. There were not enough post-office inspectors available to go into the field and make a survey of the service, with a view to reorganization, so the maps of the various States were brought forth and clerks were set to work, combining routes, cutting out routes, and generally changing things. It saved money and it gave the rural carriers something to do.

But since Congress has been in Washington the department has heard a different verdict on the reorganization. Members of Congress, bombarded with letters from back home, have besieged the department, demanding to know what has happened to the Rural Service. Farmers are writing to their Congressmen, asserting that they can not get their mail, that they can not use the parcel post, and that deliveries are uncertain or are never made.

A delegation of rural representatives descended on the House Post Office Committee and served notice that the Post Office appropriation bill will be bitterly fought unless something is done. The committee almost immediately agreed to increase the appropriation for rural-carrier pay submitted by the department, by some $5,000,000. A dozen bills prescribing what shall be a maximum rural route have been introduced, and there is a good chance that one of them will find its way to the statute books.

The Democratic administration undertakes to defend itself on the steps to motorize the rural carriers, and has chosen Senator POMERENE as its mouthpiece in Ohio. I here submit an editorial from the Xenia Gazette on this defense:

A BRAVE MAN.

Senator ATLEE POMERENE is a bold, brave man to come to the relief of the Post Office Department in its troubles anent the motorization of the rural routes. It is to be feared that the Senator is more brave than discreet, for the subject is loaded.

The Senator says there will be 31 Greene County families served by the new method who were not previously served. Granting, in the absence of knowledge, that this is correct, it easily would be possible to point out three times that number who have been receiving mail at their own doors who now must go from a furlong to a mile after it, to say nothing of the hundreds of farmers whose address is changed and whose mail will for years be subject to the delays incident to that fact.

There was a plain and obvious method of motorizing the mail service which would not have cost a cent to install, which would not have discommoded a single patron, which could have provided for the 31 additional families, and which would have effected the same saving of expense which is the department's ostensible motive for motorization. It would have been merely to take the service as it stands and provide for the serving by autovehicles of two of the present routes by one carrier. This could have been done either by throwing the routes together and letting the carrier lay out the method of service or by providing that he should take one route in the morning and the other in the afternoon. Experience shows that the mail on a single 25-mile route can be routed and delivered by means of a machine in less than four hours. By making one route in the morning and the other in the afternoon, the two routes could be handled easily by one carrier; and in case of extreme weather, when not able to serve by means of autovehicle, one of the routes could be assigned to a substitute carrier, and the work could go on as at present by means of horse and wagon. In the case of the afternoon route, while the delivery of the morning mails would be somewhat delayed, yet not more so than is proposed for half of the patrons by the present motorization schemes; but there would be the advantage that by the carrier returning to the office he could carry out the later morning mails, thus giving the afternoon patrons quite as good service after all as those of the morning route.

And it need not have been necessary to dismiss all of the present carriers. Half of them could and should have been retained. However, that is to all appearances the real meat of the Post Office Department's plan. The motorization of the rural routes is simply a pretext for the dismissal of the old carriers and the appointment of Democrats in their places. There is no better excuse for it.

I here submit a list of persons who will be affected by this change in service.

LONDON, OHIO, November 24, 1915.

Hon. S. D. FESS, M. C.

DEAR SIR: We, the rural carriers of ——— County, met and passed a resolution that I should write to you and ask you to consider a question of great importance to all the rural population and of vital importance to us.

About two weeks ago we received word in this county that an examination would be held to qualify carriers for routes of 50 or more miles from the post offices of this county. We understand that all of our routes will be revised and motor service established.

We do not think it is possible to give service with a machine all of the year over 50-mile routes on our roads, or even over 25 or 30 miles, as we now have. Some of the carriers are using machines, but lay them aside for a part of the winter months. What could they do over 50 or more miles? I am one of the motor-cycle boys that will have to give up the motor cycle the first of the year.

In our talks with the patrons along the routes we find that they are not in favor of the 50-mile service, for they know the condition of the roads. They do not want any changes that will deprive or curtail their mail service in the least, even on this economy plan of the Postmaster General. A number of them have offered to circulate petitions not to have the service changed, knowing that the carrier has enough to do now to be efficient.

Efficiency they want, rather than economy that will delay their mail or cause them to go to a crossroad after it.

We therefore ask you to consider this question (as we know you have) and when Congress convenes this next month do whatever you can to relieve the situation. We see that the rural-mail problem is one of the questions to be brought up early in the game.

We feel that you are with us on this question and that it will be unnecessary to get these petitions out, but, however, if you would like to have them, we will see to it that the patrons go ahead and send them in to you.

Thanking you in advance for any interest that you may take in this matter, we are your supporters and servants of the people on our routes.

Yours, and obliged,

THE ——— COUNTY RURAL LETTER CARRIERS' ASSOCIATION.

JANUARY 25, 1916.

Hon. S. D. FESS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I was very much pleased to know that you are interested in the welfare of the rural-route carriers and their patrons. Our county is to be motorized April 1. As a carrier of 10 years' experience, I am satisfied that the thing will not work. I am using an auto right now, and I find that my route of 22 miles with the many stops one has to make is nervous strain enough without any more mileage. I am in hopes that Congress will take some action in the matter, and if I read the action of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads correctly, they are inclined to help us.

If not too much trouble, wish you would give me some insight to what may be the action of the committee and Congress relative to motor routes.

My wife was a student at Ada when you were there, and for that reason I am taking the liberty to write you.

Respectfully,

———— ————.

JANUARY 28, 1916.

MY DEAR FRIEND: I am glad to have your approval of our opposition to the proposed rural change. The activity started against this project has not only comprehended Ohio but it has reached the other States, whose representatives are daily complimenting me for what we are doing. I can not at this time be sure of results, but one of the Ohio delegation will present a resolution which I prepared and will make a strong presentation. We are not going to allow this thing to be done quietly.

Thanking you for writing me and asking to be remembered to my friends, including your wife, I am,

Yours, very truly,

———— ————.

Letter from a carrier in the seventh district:

Hon. S. D. FESS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Having seen in different papers your articles in regard to the Rural Mail Service, I take the pleasure to write you to thank you and hope something may be done to stem this tide of false economy in the department's plans in regard to the rural free delivery. I know enough in regard to the work (having served nine years)—that there is only a good living as it is, and time a man would have to buy a machine and the upkeep on a 50-mile route he would not make as good a living out of it as he does now.

No examination has been ordered for here, but as it is all around us we are living in dread fear that ours will be next. Only living with work a week or so ahead makes it mighty hard with a man who has a family to keep and a home only partially paid for. Must lose home if I lose my work. Sad prospect.

The carriers are opposed to it at this place, and my patrons say they do not want a change. Are satisfied, as they believe the rural free delivery is the only return they can see coming back to them. In this session of Congress, when the bills that have been introduced come up in favor of the old carriers who are giving their best to the service, we want you to know we are giving you our support, and all we ask you to do is to fight for us by using your influence and vote.

Yours, truly,

———— ————.

The following are letters from patrons of the routes, business men and farmers:

CEDARVILLE, OHIO, January 17, 1916.

Hon. S. D. FESS.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I am inclosing resolutions that were passed January 14 and 15 at the recent session of the farmers' institute. I do not recall anything so recently that has disturbed the farmers of our vicinity so much as the order that came to our postmaster last week that the present Rural Free Delivery Service will cease to be the same on the close of March 31. These resolutions have my hearty support, not because I happen to be one of the committee but because I am a patron of the rural free delivery at the present time and under the present arrangement. I am 5½ miles from our post office at the present. I will be 22 miles from the post office, as the route G, the new route, will come to me. I can call at the office any time I happen to be in Cedarville and get my mail, a thing I often do on account of convenience, and I do not think I would care to go to Xenia to get some expected mail that I wanted and had not come to the office after the postman had gone. The present route is 27 miles; the new one is to be 34. Our carrier uses a machine to carry his mail when the roads are in condition. For three weeks he has not had his machine out on the route. I have seen the time it was almost impossible to go over the route with his horse and wagon, and it often happens that he can not get through with it under any circumstances. How will the motorized routes be able to double the territory that our present postman can not do now.

I think it will be a detriment to our business. After being established so long at a given place and now changing your residence, will it not be a detriment? I do not see how it will improve the Post Office Department at Washington; we are having a good and efficient system and why trade if off for an untried and overburdened one. If a change is to be made, why not combine the three present Cedarville routes into two routes, and then we can all get home service. One other thing that is hinted at in the resolutions: some of the patrons will not get service at their homes as now. I will mention Mr. O. E. Bradfute; he will have to go a mile to get his mail. He also told me there would be a number of his neighbors would have to do the same thing. I hope you can in some way intercede to have the order revoked. I fully know that ordinarily the road for you to act upon is on the other fellow's territory, politically speaking; but the people are the Government and I am sure somebody in Washington will hear from this section of the country, and anything you can do will be appreciated by your friends. This copy of the resolutions I am sending you are copied from the original, and I have written them off and also taken the responsibility to also copy the signatures of the different persons.

I am, yours, truly,

G. E. JOBE.

LONDON, OHIO, January 22, 1916.

Hon. S. D. FESS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Owing to the condition of our roads about three months in the year, and being engaged in the automobile business, I feel that I am qualified to express an opinion on the subject of the rural mail carrier's job.

It is simply impossible for any car or any man to carry the mail by automobile 12 months in the year over our roads, and the fact that the trips are to be doubled makes it so much the more impossible. I had cars out yesterday and the drivers had to run on second speed nearly all the time, and first speed part of the time.

Hoping you will continue to fight against the proposition, I beg to remain,

Yours, truly, M. L. BURNHAM, Mayor.

QUINCY, OHIO, January 24, 1916.

Hon. S. D. FESS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have been reading in the papers the stand you have taken in regard to motorizing mail routes and we wish to commend you for the stand you have taken. Our business is to deal with the farmers from the rural districts, and nearly every man thinks you have taken the right stand; they figure with the bad roads we have in some places they would not get their mail more than three days in the week, and they are well satisfied the way the rural routes are at present. Again we commend you for the stand you have taken, and we would also urge you to vote to submit prohibition to the States.

Yours, very truly,

THE QUINCY GRAIN CO.,
Per W. A. NISONGER.

CEDARVILLE, OHIO, January 17, 1916.

Hon. S. D. FESS,
Representative of Seventh District.

DEAR MR. FESS: I would respectfully ask you to use your influence to oppose the rural free-delivery changes in this county as proposed by the Post Office Department. We pay taxes on 235 acres of land, and the proposed change will not give us any benefit of the Rural Free Delivery Service. We will be compelled to go over 1 mile for our mail. I am a breeder of pure-bred stock, also president of the Green County Agricultural Board. The changing of my address and delay of mail would be a great business inconvenience.

Very respectfully, yours, S. T. BAKER.

A stanch Republican, who has always supported you.

CEDARVILLE, OHIO, February 5, 1916.

Representative FESS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In regard to the proposed plan of motorizing the mail routes of our county I wish to be numbered among those who are opposed to such a plan.

Respectfully, yours, HOWARD HARBISON.

CEDARVILLE, OHIO, February 5, 1916.

Hon. S. D. FESS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRIEND DR. FESS: As a town and community we are very earnestly concerned about the new postal regulations for rural free delivery. We feel that Cedarville is not being given a fair deal, and I personally thank you for registering a protest. If we must have motorization, at least let one if not more routes go out of Cedarville, so we may be found on the map and our individuality as a community not wholly wiped out. I shall not presume to suggest remedies, for you know them by heart. I do assure you, however, that this letter voices the sentiment of every citizen of Cedarville and all rural free delivery routes connected therewith, and if this order of the Postmaster General is carried out our people will to do something to try to correct it. I simply write to let you know we approve of your course.

Very truly, yours, MIRON I. MARSH.

PLAIN CITY, OHIO, December 3, 1915.

Hon. S. D. FESS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On December 11 our county (Madison) will hold an examination for the establishment of motor routes, and no doubt you have had protests and petitions from many.

I was postmaster at this place for four years just past, and I think I am in position to judge the condition and outcome of such a change. It is my honest opinion and belief that a change from the present system of the Rural Delivery Service would greatly impair the efficiency of a well-organized system in a great many ways. It would change the carriers' schedule in the morning from one to two hours later, and that would delay the farmers' outgoing mail several hours. It now leaves at 1.40 p. m. The length of route (50 miles) on the roads such as we have in Madison and Union Counties means irregular mail service for the farmer, and I do not think the carrier can make the extra mileage for the extra compensation allowed. To me that will mean new carriers every so often, besides many other things which will come up. It looks to me like a very unwise move on the part of our department officials to economize by beginning on the farmer, when they should be the last ones on whom to economize. The Rural Delivery Service has been one of the greatest conveniences ever established for the American farmer by our Government, and he should be encouraged instead of discouraged. The Rural Delivery Service has been the means of revolutionizing the farm life and has made things worth while. Now, to have it disarranged for the saving of a few dollars certainly is not the object of our great Government. I hope you will feel as I do in this matter and at once help to put a stop to our Postmaster General's economy idea for the benefit of our farmers and the well-regulated routes from the towns in Madison County.

Very truly, yours, CHAS. WILSON.

COOK, OHIO, November 30, 1915.

Hon. S. D. FESS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We who are patrons of the rural free delivery are dissatisfied with the changes being made or about to be made in the Rural Free Delivery Service.

Routes are to be lengthened, portions of routes abandoned, which we are satisfied will result in an uncertain and limited service. When so much is being said and written about keeping people on the farm, when we are needing more producers and less consumers, when each year sees an increasing number leaving the farm for the town and city because of the loneliness of country life, it would seem a poor policy to tamper with the Rural Free Delivery Service, which has done so much to improve conditions on the farms.

We are aware it—the rural free delivery—does not pay its way; many valuable institutions do not pay in dollars and cents; yet it means much to many who are far removed from the centers of population.

If you will use your influence toward preserving the Rural Free Delivery Service in its present very satisfactory form I am sure it will be appreciated by many in your district.

Yours, respectfully, HOWARD CHENOWETH.

JEFFERSONVILLE, OHIO, January 6, 1916.

Hon. S. D. FESS, M. C.,
Washington.

DEAR MR. FESS: Permit a little intrusion on your valued time to protest to you as a mail patron and ex-postmaster against this so-called economy as is now being ordered in the rural delivery division of the mail service, which is the "goat" of all the so-called would-be saving in the postal department.

Whenever the proposition of money saving or retrenchment comes up it seems to be the idea that it all should begin and end in the rural delivery division, which vitally affects the farmers everywhere.

Speaking locally of the service here, we have the two heaviest routes in this section, and it would tear the service all to pieces to try to combine them into one route, which move would be rank folly with the service here.

In view of the fact that surrounding counties are to have this so-called motor service which we have here now, as each carrier having a machine and getting his mail before noon, when the roads are in a fit condition, but in the past 10 days the roads have been so they had all they could do to make it.

Locally the farmers are getting all stirred up over this business, and we hear radical expressions from them where the service has already been ordered in the vicinity of Jamestown. It looks to us here like the automobile and the rural routes are to be the "goats" of the money-making and the money saving of the present administration.

If it is not out of the way, the writer and many others of your friends would like to read of our Congressman making a speech against this movement, which so vitally affects the farmers' welfare, who are entitled to the best of mail service.

It looks very much like only a cheap way of getting rid of an efficient force of rural carriers all over the country before the coming election, and have been informed that hardly any of the present carriers will take the new examination on account of the absurdity of the proposition.

Yours, respectfully, W. W. WILLIAMS.

JEFFERSONVILLE, OHIO, January 11, 1916.

DEAR MR. FESS: Yours of the 8th at hand, and pleased to hear that you are active against the changes as proposed by the department in the rural service.

This proposed "economy" is only a grandstand play to eliminate a lot of good rural carriers, many of whom happen to be Republicans.

If they must replace them, have them do it with the routes as they now are, and not double them, to cripple the whole service, as it now is; and now the roads are so bad here that the carriers had to give up their machines and go in wagons, temporarily at least.

I am satisfied that the farmers, regardless of politics, will approve of your fight against this change.

SPRING VALLEY, OHIO, December 23, 1915.

Dr. S. D. Fess, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: According to reports, the post office at Spring Valley is to be abolished.

Such an action is a disgrace to the country and will work many hardships and inconveniences. The rural mail routes are to start from Xenia and be doubled, from 25 miles to 50 miles, which is so long that no carrier can do the work. I trust that you will present a protest against such a measure and exercise every effort possible to prevent the action. Wishing you a Merry Christmas and a successful future, I am,

Very respectfully, FREMONT MIARS.

SABINA, OHIO, January 14, 1916.

Hon. S. D. FESS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: What I wish to write about is the changing of our rural-mail routes—by merging two or three in one and the use of auto delivery in the place of "old Dobbin."

We farmers have many routes over which it is impossible to go with an auto about one-fourth of the year, whereas an old-fashioned mail wagon can and is being drawn by horse power.

It is in bad weather that the "old farmer" or "hayseed" wants his daily mail, because he has time to read it, and it helps to break the monotony of rural life.

Our mail man taught me my first term of school, and he says that the carriers do not dare to enter protest, so I shall. This man gets $1,200 per year, and if the route was sold to the lowest responsible bidder it would not sell for over $800. That sum ($1,200) is equal to the gross income from 100 acres of land in our Buckeye State. If this man did not have some such job, he would be dependent on his children or would have the poorhouse staring him in the face. One great advantage of the shorter horse route versus the longer auto route is that it gives employment to many an old man that is unfit for hard manual labor. Then it helps to wear out some of our 1,000-pound horses that have become very low in price.

The proper thing to do is to keep the salary down to from $800 to $1,000 for these rural routes and extend them over routes that have some dirt roads in them, because there are miles and miles of dirt roads in the State of Ohio that never can be graveled.

Advocates of our "new-school code" say, "Gravel the roads." It takes "money to make the mare go," and we have high taxes in Jefferson Township, Greene County, now, where I reside. Our new school building, which will cost us $5,500 before it is completed, adds to our taxes, as will the additional cost of running it, as it will cost nearly as much to haul the pupils to the building as to hire "girl" teachers for the rural or subdistricts.

I am one of the board members, and we expect lots of dissatisfaction when we go to hauling next fall. We have roads over which we must haul that are very bad, and it will be a great problem to gravel them the way they do nowadays with our road tax. We used to build a little strip every year, where the farmer put in one day with the team; but now everything goes on the main road to make good autoing.

Yours, truly, J. H. CHITTY.

YELLOW SPRINGS, OHIO, January 10, 1916.

Dr. S. D. FESS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRIEND: Mr. Hackett received an order this morning discontinuing all rural routes out of Yellow Springs after March 31, 1916. The new routes indicate that such of our rural-route patrons that will be served at all will be served from Xenia, even coming right up to the corporation limits, in other places leaving out numbers of patrons on good roads that will have no service. The most impractical thing about this change is that a greater part of the routes are on some of the poorest roads and will be impassable a part of the winter months. If this radical change can even be modified somewhat, can the residents of Miami and Cedarville Townships help by sending petitions? Any information from you concerning this matter will be gladly received.

Yours, truly, GEO. H. DRAKE.

XENIA, OHIO, January 24, 1916.

Hon. S. D. FESS:

I want to voice my protest against the motorization of the rural route in Greene County. The present system is very efficient and the other will not be in our case, as our road will be left out entirely.

Please do all you can against the new system.

Respectfully, EDGAR T. BALLARD.

JANUARY 3, 1916.

Mr. FESS.

DEAR SIR: We are entirely satisfied with the present service on rural route and also with the carrier, who is efficient and gives the work the best of attention and care, and it would greatly inconvenience us to have our mail sent out from Xenia as the station, for the new route would be long and it would necessarily be many hours, with the roads in good condition, for the mail to reach us after it was received there.

MARTHA BELL.

JANUARY 3, 1916.

Mr. FESS.

DEAR SIR: In regard to the proposed change in rural route service, we do seriously object to having our mail detoured by way of Xenia as a distributing station, making us receive our mail most any time in the day, according to the route taken by the carrier.

Our present system is perfectly satisfactory and carrier absolutely dependable and suits in all respects, as well as anyone could. He is prompt and efficient, making very few mistakes even in similar names. While we are only a mile out of town, it would greatly inconvenience us to have a change.

C. W. ALLEN AND FAMILY.

SPRING VALLEY, OHIO, December 23, 1915.

To S. D. FESS,
Yellow Springs, Ohio.

DEAR SIR: We understand there is going to be a change made in our mail service, increasing the route of the carrier to 50 miles. Our service is now good. If it is increased there will be a good many days when he can't cover the new route with a motor, which he can at present do with a horse. We think if we have our post office changed it will not prove satisfactory. The old routes will be restored and this will result in our mail addresses becoming mixed. If you can aid us to keep our mail as it is we will surely appreciate it.

Yours, JOHN TURNER, Jr.

SPRING VALLEY, OHIO, January 6, 1916.

S. D. FESS,
Yellow Springs, Ohio.

DEAR SIR: I saw in the paper where you were fighting the change in rural free delivery. Keep up the good work, for we as farmers are all with you, as a change can make it no better. A happy and prosperous year to you.

H. M. THOMAS.

SPRING VALLEY, December 25, 1915.

S. D. FESS,
Yellow Springs, Ohio.

DEAR SIR: We have heard that the rural mail service is to be changed, the routes to be 50 miles long and motorized. This will be impractical, because much of the time, on account of bad roads, a motor can not be used, and a horse can not travel 50 miles in one day.

Furthermore, we will receive mail much later in the day, a decided disadvantage; and the office being moved to Xenia is unfair to the smaller town.

If you can use your influence to preserve the route as it is, we will certainly appreciate it.

HENRY B. WELLER.

SPRING VALLEY, OHIO, December 24, 1915.

Dr. S. D. FESS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have a matter I would like you to give your influence to in regard to the proposed change in rural carrier business. They are expecting to take our mail from Spring Valley and putting it from Xenia, making a 50-mile route, you know. I do not think the Government will find that practical the year through, and we as subscribers having to change our addresses cause some unnecessary delay until matters get adjusted. You know that. Then, about the time they get adjusted the next administration will change it again, probably, and another time. Then, some one is probably left out that now is being served. I understand probably 3 or 4 families would be cut out in our neighborhood.

I wish, as one of your constituents, you would consider this matter in our behalf, and if you see it to our advantage take measures to help us, if you will.

Trusting this will meet with your approval, I remain,

Very truly,

J. F. PUTERBAUGH.

SPRING VALLEY, OHIO, December 30, 1915..

Hon. S. D. FESS:

You being our Representative from the sixth district, I thought I would drop you a line imploring you to not let the change being made in our rural free delivery come to pass, as it is very satisfactory to us at present and don't believe it can be improved. It is the greatest thing the Government ever did for the farmer, and hope you will do what you can to have them continued as they are at present. We do not want our delivery changed from Spring Valley.

Yours, and obliged,

S. K. HAINES.

DECEMBER 29, 1915.

S. D. FESS, M. C.

DEAR SIR: I am writing you as a patron on mail route, which they are going to cut me out of receiving my mail at my door and many others besides me. I would be very much disappointed to lose the route which has given us such valuable service for the last 14 years. I appeal to you as our honorable Member of Congress from this district to do your utmost to prevent this.

Yours, truly,

J. R. MCBEE.

JANUARY 14, 1916.

Mr. S. D. FESS.

SIR: I live on route. We understand that our mail route is to be changed, for which we are bitterly opposed for many reasons. First, when we were put on the rural route, it took a year for to get our mail straightened out. Now, then, to think it must be changed again, we consider it out of place and the way it is to be changed—to give a man 50 miles for a route. Our roads will average as good in our section as any in the State of Ohio. Our carrier has tried by horse and by auto; finds it at times almost impossible to get through, and we have as good a carrier as the country can afford. And now to be changed is out of the question. As to 50 miles for a route; it is out of the question, for no man can make it for a portion of the year. For the amount of mail to be distributed; and the houses will average no more than a third of a mile apart, with two to five members to a family, and generally all to receive mail. For this reason, a man can no more than distribute his mail, let alone handling his machine and watch the road.

We hope you will help us to keep our present route and carrier as it now is. We would like to hear from you at once about this. What you think of the matter.

Yours, truly,

W. N. ROHRBAUGH.

XENIA, OHIO, February 6, 1916.

Hon. S. D. FESS,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR DOCTOR FESS: I have just read in the Rural Free Delivery News of February 5 your very able defense before the House Post Office Committee of the present efficient service rendered by rural carriers in our congressional district, and in particular that of Greene County; and take this means to personally thank you for championing a cause so near the hearts of rural patrons and carriers.

We probably have as good average roads as any section in Ohio, but to serve all the people we must traverse all the roads both good and bad, of which the latter we will have in many years to come; and had an inspector gone over any of Greene County routes during the past month, it would be many moons before we would again hear of doubling routes for motor service.

Under present system it requires an average of two hours' office work daily for each carrier. Double the work means double the time in office with a bulk of mail, we believe, beyond the ability of a carrier to handle efficiently, no matter what means used for transportation, as has been proven wherever motor routes of 50 to 60 miles have been installed.

I am, most respectfully,

CEDARVILLE, OHIO, February 8, 1916.

The Hon. S. D. FESS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FESS: We are writing you in regard to the change in our rural free-delivery routes. We note by the different papers that you are opposed to this change and that you really do not need any urging in regard to using your influence against it being made. However, we thought you might be interested in hearing from some of your constituents in regard to the matter. We are very much opposed to this change, for we feel sure it will prove to be a hindrance rather than a help to the community in general.

We are inclosing a clipping from the Journal-Republican, which we thought you might be able to use to an advantage and which we believe expresses very clearly the existing condition in Greene County.

We congratulate you on the progress you have already made in interfering with the change in these routes.

Assuring you that the patrons of your district appreciate the stand you are taking in this matter and hoping that you will be successful in preventing this change to take place, we are,

Sincerely,

HOME CLOTHING CO.,
Per G. H. HARTMAN.

The clipping referred to in this letter, which follows, shows the results of this change:

MOTOR MAIL ROUTES—GIVEN POKE IN EYE BY WEATHER MAN, PROVING PLAN IMPRACTICAL.

The article appearing below is copied from the Waynesville Gazette, and is a sample of what is being recounted everywhere in all the papers of the country. The Gazette says:

"The rural mail carriers have surely been having an awful time delivering mail. In several instances the roads really have no bottom and machines go axle-deep in mud and water. Saturday the boys had to be pushed out of ruts one or more times. George Mills was particularly unfortunate. His machine broke completely down, and he had to make his delivery by horse and buggy. Through the winter season the Government ought to put on substitutes and make the distances shorter, as the boys have a hard enough time to make their original trips."

Few, if any, of the nine carriers out of the Wilmington office have attempted to make the rounds with a machine. The drivers are either using horses of their own or are hiring from the livery stables. Oliver Hiatt, driver of route No. 9, which covers the Cuba-Mount Pleasant-Villars Chapel neighborhoods, tells the Journal-Republican that he has been swapping horses in the middle of the stream, as it were, every day. He keeps one horse at his home here and another on a farm about half way along the route. This gives each horse something like 15 miles a day, and does not overwork either. Others are doing the same thing, perhaps, but the automobile is almost out of the question on the kind of roads that has prevailed within recent weeks.

DAYTON, OHIO, February 10, 1916.

Hon. S. D. FESS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am a voter on rural free delivery No. 8, Dayton, Ohio, living in Greene County. We have good mail service that is in danger of being crippled by the establishment of a 50-mile route. Why don't Mr. Burleson start the route in January in place of April? We expect to fight to a finish having our mail changed to Xenia. We expect you, as our Representative, to help us hold our mail route from Dayton. We have our telephone system from Dayton and we do our business with that city and we want our mail from there.

Trusting we will have your assistance, I am,

Respectfully,

I. J. COX.

DAYTON, OHIO, February 10, 1916.

Hon. S. D. FESS.

SIR AND FRIEND: I believe it has become the duty of every American citizen and voter to take care of himself when we see a foe surrounding us on all sides and trying to trample us under their feet, so I believe it is time for us to call for help in the hour of such a disaster as is about to befall us all in the mail matter, such as changing our mail system, when we have one of the best our Nation has ever experienced. We therefore call on our Congressman, S. D. FESS, for help. We earnestly ask you to do your best to help us hold our mail service and rural routes as they are.

Hoping to hear from you soon, and seeing what you have done for us and believing what you will do in the future, we remain your support at the polls.

Yours,

E. B. KIETER,
Central Committeeman Beaver Creek Township,
Greene County, Ohio.

YELLOW SPRINGS, OHIO, February 13, 1916.

Dr. S. D. FESS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRIEND: I am inclosing the Gazette's report of your talk at the institute. This gives some people the idea that they can have their mail addressed as formerly at Yellow Springs. Now, if this be true, the order that has gone out to the postmaster will have to be changed as it clearly says that after March 31 Yellow Springs rural routes will be discontinued, and inclosed with this order are two specifications of routes out of Xenia, entirely circling our town, designating by what route the patrons will receive their mail, also one specification from Osborne that will reach some of the present Yellow Springs patrons (and this route from a town that is soon to disappear from the face of the earth). Your objections to the change of address is the thing that will hit the department the hardest, as if the present order is put in force the confusion and inconvenience will be incalculable. We feel that if the present order can be deferred for a time the department can find a more practical plan and just as economical as the one they have planned for this county.

Yours, truly,

GEO. H. DRAKE.

The following letters are from persons outside of my district:

JANUARY 26, 1916.

Hon. S. D. FESS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: I take this opportunity to write you a word in reference to the rural mail readjustment now going on in Ohio.

Now, it seems to me the service in this section of Ohio, at least, can't be made better. The roads are not in condition for regular automobile service more than five or six months in the year; then they are very hilly, and it is extremely wearing on a machine at any time. The roads now—even the pikes—are in very bad condition, and it takes nearly seven hours to make the trips, besides the time in the office.

Our schedule is from 9 a. m. to 3.30 p. m., and we must be in at 3 p. m. to catch the mail east, and we make the mail, except when the roads are very bad, by driving right through without stopping to feed or eat dinner. I have been in the service since February 1, 1905, and am now in my fifty-third year. Started at $60 per month and did hardly make ends meet, but the salary advanced until now I can begin, by careful living, to pay my mortgage on my home (of $1,200) off; but if I am thrown out by this readjustment plan it will surely put me, with a great many other carriers, in very bad position.

Do not think motor service can be successfully operated, in this county at least. Hoping you will give this matter your early and careful attention, I beg to remain,

Your friend,

———— ————.

WEST MANCHESTER, OHIO, January 12, 1916.

Hon. S. D. FESS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: A few days ago I noticed an article in the Ohio State Journal that Yellow Springs and Cedarville would lose their rural carriers through the motor service. I also noticed that you were going to use your influence to prevent it.

About the 1st of November we had the information that this town would lose its rural route and be served from Lewisburg, despite that this town has the best railway mail service in the county and Lewisburg about the poorest. We protested to our Representative, but he said he was powerless to do anything.

I am inclosing herewith several copies of front sheet of one of the Richmond, Ind., papers, which will give you some idea as to how the motor service is succeeding there. This may not interest you, but I judged it would be effective ammunition to use just now.

Very respectfully, yours,

R. H. SILER.

NEWARK, OHIO, February 2, 1916.

DEAR SIR: It certainly seems to me that in our part of the State the motorizing of the mail routes seems impracticable. Do they expect to try and extend it to Licking County?

Yours,

W. L. FISK.

I also submit my statement before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads:

STATEMENT OF SIMEON D. FESS, A REPRESENTATIVE FROM OHIO.

Mr. FESS. Gentlemen, I had not intended to take any time of the committee, but the situation in my immediate vicinity, including my own town, where I live, has been so unsatisfactory in the last few weeks, and I have been so unable to give any information, not being able to get the information, I feel that I ought to lay the matter before the committee here.

Mr. BELL. You have reference to motor service?

Mr. FESS. Yes. While at home I called upon our postmaster. I asked him what the order was in reference to the routes affecting our particular county. He said he did not have any information at all, other than that there was to be an examination, to be held on the 22d.

Mr. COX. An examination for what, Doctor?

Mr. FESS. For the new proposal of the motor routes, displacing the present routes.

Mr. GRIEST. You mean an examination for letter carriers?

Mr. FESS. Yes. Then I called upon the postmaster at Xenia the county-seat town of the county, and he told me he was unable to give me any information whatever, save that there had been an order issued for an examination for the 31st, in reference to the Xenia routes. I have been literally besieged with letters from various points, not only in my county, but in my whole district. There is not a county in the district that has not sent me letters and sent me resolutions, signed by citizens of that community, who are patrons to be served.

Mr. COX. Will it disturb you if I ask you the area and population and the number of routes in your home county?

Mr. FESS. There are 10 in my home county.

Mr. COX. What is the area of that county?

Mr. FESS. The area—I could not give you the exact size of the county.

Mr. COX. Well, just approximately.

Mr. FESS. Do you live in the same county, though?

Mr. COX. What is the population?

Mr. FESS. I think about 31,000. I could not say that definitely.

Mr. COX. Largely rural?

Mr. FESS. Yes; altogether rural in my own home county.

Mr. COX. Do you live in the same county in which Xenia is located?

Mr. FESS. Yes. I have here one of the many letters to which I referred, and this one is from a committee of seven, representing the rural carriers of Montgomery and Greene Counties. They say:

"Owing to the contemplated change in the rural free-delivery mail service, whereby it is proposed to increase the length of rural routes from the present average of about 26 miles to that of approximately 55 miles each per route, and whereby it is further proposed to increase the compensation for such service from the present maximum of $1,200 per carrier per annum to that of a maximum of $1,800 each per carrier, we, the undersigned committee, representing the rural carriers of Montgomery and Greene Counties, Ohio, believing that compensation provided under the new service is by no means commensurate with the labor to be performed, beg to submit the accompanying facts—"

And then I have here the facts set forth in objection to the proposed change.

"The following is an estimated account of performing the service by means of motor vehicle for an uninterrupted period of 10 months in the year, together with the cost of providing means for serving the route during the other two months of the year, when an uninterrupted service could not be performed by means of motor vehicle."

Then follows an itemized statement of the cost, and this is signed by various members from Dayton and Spring Valley and Xenia.

Mr. STEENERSON. Have you any complaints from any of the patrons?

Mr. FESS. Oh, yes; numerous complaints.

Mr. STEENERSON. What is the substance of their grievance?

Mr. FESS. That the mails will not be delivered regularly—can not be—for the reason that our roads are in such shape that an automobile can not possibly do it.

Mr. BRITT. What is the condition of your roads?

Mr. FESS. Our roads, in general, are not bad; they are as good as they are in any section.

Mr. STEENERSON. Are they dirt roads?

Mr. FESS. Yes; many of them are dirt roads. Here is a letter from a resident of my own town, who never mixes in politics, or who is not a mischief-maker, but one of our best business men. He, Mr. Hackett, is our postmaster:

"Received an order this morning discontinuing all rural routes out of Yellow Springs after March 31. The new routes indicate that such of our patrons as will be served at all will be served from Xenia, even coming up to our corporate line limits, in other cases leaving out numbers of patrons on good roads having good service. The most impractical thing is that some of the routes are on the poorest roads and will be impassable during part of the winter months. If this radical change can even be modified somewhat, would the residents of Miami and Cedarville Townships help by sending petitions? Any information that is possible we would be glad to receive."

Now, this man is not a busybody or a mischief-maker; he is a citizen of our town who takes no particular part in politics, but knows the county, possibly, as well as any man in the county.

Mr. BRITT. You think that he is disinterested?

Mr. FESS. Yes; that is disinterested; and he is the strongest friend the postmaster has in the town.

Mr. MADDEN. Are they cut out of the opportunity of getting their mail as regularly as they used to?

Mr. FESS. They are.

Mr. BLACK. Is the service now in effect, Mr. FESS?

Mr. FESS. No; the new service is to go into effect on March 31.

Mr. BLACK. Then you can not tell.

Mr. FESS. No; I should say this: A road seems to be a road to the inspector whether it be a dirt road or a macadam road, and the inspector has been required, it seems, by the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General to cut out retraces, so absolutely necessary in making the service complete, and here is one of our citizens who will be cut out entirely.

Mr. COX. What per cent of your roads are hard surface?

Mr. FESS. I should judge perhaps more than 50 per cent of them. Our roads are actually pretty good, many of them.

Mr. COX. What is your home town?

Mr. FESS. Yellow Springs.

Mr. COX. How far is it from Xenia?

Mr. FESS. Nine miles, and 9 miles from Springfield. Why I asked to come before the committee was this: Not being able to get any information at all to reply to those who wrote me, I called at the Post Office Department. I wanted to see the general superintendent of all this. I am going to say to this committee what those who know me will know is true. If this proposed change were for the benefit of the country at large or the State at large and would be inconvenient to some localities, even my own town, I would not offer the protest, because I believe that you have got to serve the larger interest; but I can not get any information about this thing. I have a right to know what is going to be done. I think every person here, without regard to politics, will agree that I have a right, and when I appear before the Post Office Department in order to get this information and am told that I can not see the man in charge because he is busy and for me to come at another time, and so on, I do not think that is the proper treatment for a Congressman who tries to be fair to everybody; and that is the treatment I have received.

Mr. COX. Whom did you seek out down there or try to find?

Mr. FESS. Gen. Wood.

Mr. COX. George Wood?

Mr. FESS. Yes. I thought he was the proper party to go to, because he had this in charge.

Mr. COX. When were you down there?

Mr. FESS. I was down there the latter part of last week.

Mr. STEENERSON. The superintendent of rural delivery?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. In the Fourth Assistant's office?

Mr. FESS. Yes. I have this feeling about it, gentlemen: I do not think that is the kind of a reception a Congressman should receive in one of the departments.

The CHAIRMAN. Doctor, I think you are right about being entitled to be heard, but I want to say to you that your experience is like that of some of the others of us. For 14 or 15 years I have been unable to get any hearing on some matters. It seems to be the rule. It has been heretofore the rule, and perhaps may be kept up now.

Mr. FESS. Well, I put the question specifically whether the policy of the department was to be secretive. I felt that I was justified in taking a little time to lay this matter before you, which probably you will think is somewhat unfair. I have a statement in writing that I want to submit, which probably you will not think is fair. I want to say that there is a movement here to make these changes that has some interest in our politics.

Mr. COX. I do not think so, Doctor, I think the question is a question of better service.

Mr. FESS. I do not think so, or I should not make this, which I think is an honest fight for rights; but the instructions that have been sent out make me feel that it is a chance to get out some people and put in others. Now, I make that statement to you frankly, as a man who is not trying to take any political advantage, and if it is not that, why, I can not understand the instructions.

Mr. COX. You mean with reference to rural carriers?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. BELL. I do not think that can be true, because they are all Democrats in Georgia, and they are putting them out there under this reorganization.

Mr. FESS. The statement I had prepared was very largely on that line, and I had simply done it because I thought the department had not been fair to us, and I was calling that particular point to the attention of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. This certainly should not be a political service in any way.

Mr. FESS. I know it should not.

The CHAIRMAN. Doctor, while you are on the floor, I want to ask you this: Is it your opinion that where the department can change a route or double a route, or make any alteration that it deems to the public interest and still give as effective service as theretofore, that you object to the change?

Mr. FESS. No; I would not. I make that statement frankly. I would not object to a change if I though that the department was getting as efficient service and as economical service by making the change. I do not think I would be justified in doing it, and I would not do it; but all the evidence that comes to me from the information that I have sought is on the other side; that it will not be as efficient, and it certainly can not be as efficient, in my opinion.

Mr. BELL. And that it is not as efficient where it has been tried?

Mr. FESS. No; it is not.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the remedy for all this?

Mr. FESS. I would leave the routes as they are in my district, very decidedly.

The CHAIRMAN. You would suggest that Congress say it should be left that way, or would you leave it to the discretion of the department?

Mr. FESS. From my experience with the department, I do not think it should be left to the discretion of the department.

The CHAIRMAN. But, as a matter of public policy, do you not think it would be unwise for Congress to begin to designate the routes that should remain and those that should be changed?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, if there is no partisan advantage being seized upon—that is the only thing I am fearing now—if there is no advantage of that sort being sought, I would say I am willing to leave it to the administrative officers; but I can not understand why all of our Democratic postmasters in my county have had instructions on the subject mentioned and that the Republican postmaster at Xenia has had nothing. That is a little bit suspicious to me. I can not understand that. Mr. Chairman, I have written out a statement on what I call motorizing the rural carriers instead of the rural routes.

Mr. STEENERSON. What is the matter with reading it? We would like to have it.

Mr. FESS. I will read it, if it may be done with the permission of the committee, but I will not insist upon taking up your time.

Mr. STEENERSON. The committee would like to hear it. I know I would.

Mr. FESS. Shall I, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. I have no objection myself to any length of time you want to take up here. If the committee desires it, go ahead.

Mr. STEENERSON. It will not take long.

Mr. FESS. I have called this "Motorizing the rural carriers." It says:

"The department calls it 'Motorizing the Rural Service,' but we prefer the above caption as a better description of what is actually to take place; for if the plans of the Post Office Department are carried out, there will not be a single rural carrier now in the service in Greene County left to tell the tale. In other words, the Democratic office seekers have at last found a way to pry open the Rural Mail Service and have burgled their way into the Rural Service; they are to be eligible, after one year, for transfer into the clerk or carrier service of post offices or into the Railway Mail Service. The discovery of the way to do this comes just in time to reward the deserving Democrats, just prior to the presidential campaign. The rural carriers of the country have been for some years covered under the protection of the civil-service rules, which provide that 'no person in the classified civil service of the United States shall be removed therefrom except for such cause as will promote the efficiency of the service, and for reasons given in writing,' and it is provided that the accused is to be furnished with a copy of the charges and given opportunity to reply, but the ingenious officials charged with the duty of rewarding deserving Democrats have found a way. They have motorized the Rural Service, and the faithful and efficient civil servants glide out of their jobs with that smooth and imperceptible motion of which only a motor vehicle of a certain description is capable. What is a motor route? Is it anything new? Not new in the sense that it has been heretofore unknown. There are, and have been for years, thousands of these routes in the United States. There are, and have been for several years, two such routes serving the patrons of the Xenia post office. It is a new application of the term, and a new use to make of motors in connection with rural routes, which, by the way, it is claimed does not improve the routes, but in reality jeopardizes the service, and, above all, a new method of removing old carriers which the Post Office Department has found. In order to do this, and to make an excuse which will fit the above requirement of the civil-service law and rules, and to put good, faithful men who are now in the service outside the protection of those rules, the motor route has been invented and is being put into service all over the country. It has at last reached Greene County, and a civil-service examination is to be held at the Xenia post office on January 22 to establish a register from which appointments may be made for motor service, which is to go into effect, according to newspaper announcement, on April 1."

Mr. AYRES. Is there anything to prevent Republicans from taking that civil-service examination as well as the Democrats?

Mr. FESS. No; nothing to prevent it. There is a way, however, for the Republicans to be discriminated against.

Mr. AYRES. I will ask you another question. Is it not a fact that 80 per cent of the civil-service employees in the present Government service—fully 80 per cent, and, perhaps, 85 per cent—are Republicans?

Mr. FESS. I do not know that that is true. Even if it were true, one evil does not cure another.

"There is entire mystery as to just what the 'motor service' will be in Greene County. The advertisement of the Civil Service Commission calls for an examination 'to fill a vacancy at Jamestown, Osborn, Xenia, and other vacancies as they may occur on motor rural routes at post offices in the above-named county, at salaries ranging from $1,500 to $1,800 per annum.' The examination is to be an 'open competitive examination,' and as a result an eligible register for the county is to be established, from which it is expected that certification will be made for filling the vacancies in the positions of carriers on the motor rural routes at the post offices above mentioned, namely, Jamestown, Osborn, and Xenia, and other vacancies on motor rural routes at post offices in Greene County as they may occur in the future. Nothing is said of Cedarville, Yellow Springs, or Spring Valley, which heretofore have been the headquarters of several rural routes each. Presumably those routes have been dumped down the back stairway, leaving the rural service of Greene County to be conducted from the offices at Xenia, Jamestown, and Osborn, with probably some travel into the county from Dayton and Springfield as at present. Although no announcement has been made as to just what these new routes are to be like or how many of them there are to be, it is known that the Post Office Department has been working on the Greene County map for some time laying out entirely new service. The roads have not been traveled over by an inspector as was formerly the practice in making changes in the rural service. That would take entirely too long, and the deserving Democrats would stand some chance of starving to death before being able to connect up with their jobs. But a county map has been used, and the officials have proceeded in accordance with the promptings of their inner consciousness, which has probably been ample for the purpose.

"If we may judge by what has happened elsewhere, there are to be put into operation in Greene County motor routes covering 50 to 60 miles each, requiring the services of one carrier instead of two, as would be required for that mileage by wagon service. This looks, indeed, like good business; but the needs of the service are apparently not the first consideration in making these changes. It is the deserving Democrats who must be taken care of, and the erring Republicans who must be put upon the motor toboggan. In the announcement of the examination the Civil Service Commission states that 'in filling any vacancy the department is privileged to fill it either by promotion or through open competitive examination; for the above-named vacancy the department has requested the commission to certify from open competitive examination.' How fair that appears to be. 'This vacancy,' says the commission, which has added to the mystery of just what is to take place by treating of the matter as though the examination were but a routine matter to establish a register for making appointment to existing vacancies, 'this vacancy is on a route newly established as the result of consolidation of two or more existing routes or of added mileage; and upon the establishment of a new route for which the department desires a certification of eligibles, it is the commission's practice to hold a new examination in order to give all qualified persons an opportunity to compete. Furthermore, this route has a compensation materially greater than the compensation of a route allowing the delivery of mail by other than motor vehicle, and therefore certification for this vacancy can not properly be made from a register established for a materially lower compensation, because for the higher compensation there has not been competition, as required by law.'"

"You see how it is, boys. We regret that we can not promote you, as it seems we have the right to do, for the reason that a promotion can not be made to a position affording a materially higher compensation. Of course this is contrary to the general rule obtaining in the matter of promotions, which usually contemplates higher salaries, but you must consider the exigencies of the situation. The deserving Democrats are out of meat; therefore you can not be promoted, but must lose your jobs, much to our regret. The Civil Service Commission is truly sorry for the situation, and trusts that you will kindly accept its apologies. However, boys, do not feel that all is lost. You still have a chance. Your experience in the service ought to, and does, count in your favor—not to the extent, you may be sure, of endangering the chances of any deserving Democrat, but so as to look well in official reports. You are to be given credit for each year of service up to six years. How much credit? Well, we are sorry to say that is not so large a figure as it should be, but it is all you are entitled to, inasmuch as you are mostly Republicans, and there are deserving Democrats waiting for your jobs. We allow you as a matter of form and for the purpose of appearing fair not exactly 5 per cent per year, but one-half of 1 per cent per year up to three years. You may, therefore, be rated the enormous total of 3 points in a hundred, if you have served as much as six years, so much being allowed you in consideration of experience. That is what we call civil-service reform. How many of the present incumbents will this hold in their positions? Probably not a single one whose place is wanted for a deserving Democrat. The present incumbents of the rural-carrier jobs are doomed—every man of them. Such has been the experience in other places, and the handwriting is on the wall in Greene County. But there are other tricks and other means of 'motorizing' the rural carriers. The age limit for admission to rural-carrier examinations is 55 years. This shuts out many a man the country over who is showing by his daily work that he is still fit. It shuts out three of the carriers attached to the Xenia office, and would shut out still another one if he were not protected by the law which exempts veterans of the Civil War from exclusion on account of age."

Mr. FINLEY. You said 10 out of your home county. Do you mean 10 routes going out of your home town?

Mr. FESS. Ten going out of Xenia, but only three out of my home town of Yellow Springs.

"And still another trick which is fatal to every carrier in the service is the requirement that the examination be held from 9 a. m., when the carriers must be serving their routes. No exception is made in their favor, and the evil intents of the whole scheme are so apparent that it would probably do them no good to get into the examination."

Our postmaster, upon my suggestion, asked the department to make an exception here.

Mr. COX. If there is any politics in the whole proposition, and if you have any Democratic rural-route carriers in your county, that would equally apply against the Democrats as well as against the Republicans?

Mr. FESS. And we have a few Democrats.

Mr. COX. And they will be shut out, as well as the Republicans?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. How many railroads are there at Xenia?

Mr. FESS. Two.

Mr. FINLEY. Crossing each other?

Mr. FESS. Yes; one line from Springfield to Cincinnati and one from Columbus to Cincinnati. They are the Pan Handle routes. I have 764 miles of railroad in my district and 162 miles of trolley lines in the district.

Mr. FINLEY. Do the trolley lines carry any mail?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

"Such is civil-service reform as practiced by the Democratic Party, and such is the fulfillment of Democratic pledges of true reform of the civil service. But this is not all. Says the examination order: 'A rural carrier after one year's satisfactory service may be transferred to the position of clerk or carrier in a first or second class post office, railway mail clerk, or other position in the classified service, subject to such examination as may be required by the civil-service rules.' There you have it. That is the open door. Deserving Democrats, by the favor of Democratic officials, enter the motorized rural service, serve one year and become eligible to transfer into clerical and carrier positions in first and second class post offices, into the Railway Mail Service, and, indeed, into any civil-service position under the Government. There is no limit; only the noncompetitive examination required for any position being required. Once in, always in, and always eligible to a place. Enter the service as a motor carrier and become eligible for transfer to the Customs Service, to the Consular Service, to the departmental service—to any service you can procure the influence to transfer you to. Is not the Democratic Party taking care of its own? Yes; but at the expense of broken promises and a ruined civil service. And what kind of routes are established? What kind of service will the farmers have? That, as we have said, is still undeveloped. We can only guess at it, and apply the experience of other localities. These motor routes have not proven satisfactory where tried. There has been an uprising wherever they have been put into operation, and in some places a return to wagon routes has been made necessary. It is said that the makers of the motor-route maps have paid little heed to conditions which have been met by 'retraces.' Experience has shown that these 'retraces' are highly necessary in order to reach patrons. Every route out of Xenia has several of them. But there will be little 'retracing' when it comes to operating motor routes. Consequently, citizens living on 'retraces' had better look out. Numerous other objections are being raised against motor routes, one of the chief being that it will be impossible to serve them in bad weather. By departing so far from the base the inconvenience occasioned by broken bridges or similar obstacles which render roads impassable is greatly increased. Carriers, having double duty to perform, can hardly be expected to perform it so well. Length of routes will entail later service on portions of the route, etc. And there remains to be said that people who have been accustomed to having their mail sent to Cedarville, or Yellow Springs, or Spring Valley, will be a long time getting their correspondents accustomed to sending it to Xenia, Jamestown, or Osborn, for to all appearances these first-mentioned towns are to lose their rural service entirely. In fact, the only citizens who will be entirely happy with the new arrangement are the deserving Democrats; but they are so few."

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Doctor, let me ask you a question. You favor retaining the routes just as they were?

Mr. FESS. I do in my district.

The CHAIRMAN. And retaining, of course, all of the Republican carriers, just as they were?

Mr. FESS. I would not say that.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, that would be the result of it, would it not?

Mr. FESS. I would not object——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). You would object to any Democrat even having a civil-service examination by which it would be possible under the law of the land that he could get a position?

Mr. FESS. No; but I object to these people being legislated out.

The CHAIRMAN. The department has authority to act in those matters. They are not legislating; that is administration. It would seem to me if the department could better the service and reduce the cost—and they are proposing to reduce it about $4,000,000 in the United States by these changes—that it would not be improper to do so, even if here and there some Republican should lose a job. My understanding, however, is that they are not undertaking to turn them out because they are Republicans.

Mr. FESS. Well, I wish I could believe as you do.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it not a fact that that is the Civil Service Commission, and not the department?

Mr. FESS. No. My indictment is of those who will not give any information as to what is done and why it is done.

Mr. RANDALL. Is not that a requirement of the Civil Service Commission, and not by the Post Office Department?

Mr. FESS. I do not care if it is. I think it is taking advantage of our rural people. My impression is they will not do anything, and that is why I come before this committee.

Mr. BRITT. As I understand, your objection is to any changes which you believe will be injurious to the service.

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. BRITT. And not as a personal matter, unless it injures the service?

Mr. FESS. I repeat that if this change were for the interest of the Government at large, or the State at large, or the county at large, I would not come here and protest in the interest of a particular town in which I live. I am not that kind of a fellow.

Mr. BRITT. So your idea is that it is generally an unwise policy?

Mr. FESS. Yes; that is it exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. Who would know more about it—the local postmasters?

Mr. BELL. I think the Members themselves would know more about it.

Mr. FESS. I have never had an invitation to a department, and I can not get to them when I go there. I might be able to do so if I would sit there and wait.

Mr. ROUSE. You stated a while ago that you were not able to get any information from the department, and you were not able to see the superintendent. Did you go there more than once?

Mr. FESS. No.

Mr. ROUSE. You only went once and he was busy then?

Mr. FESS. I went once; got into the office; saw him through the door talking with two or three people. I waited for a time.

Mr. ROUSE. For how long?

Mr. FESS. Oh, probably for 20 minutes.

Mr. ROUSE. I know you want to be fair.

Mr. FESS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROUSE. Do we not all go to see the heads of departments and have to wait our turn?

Mr. FESS. Probably you do.

Mr. ROUSE. I know they do in law offices, and I think we should be fair to heads of departments, and try it again.

Mr. FESS. How often should I go there?

Mr. ROUSE. I go several times.

Mr. FESS. Well, there is a difference between you and me. I will not waste my time. If I can not get to the department, I will stay in my office.

Mr. BEAKES. Suppose there are other Congressmen inside?

Mr. FESS. There were not any Congressmen inside.

Mr. STEENERSON. Why did you not call on the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General instead of the superintendent of delivery?

Mr. FESS. I preferred to call on the man who was directly in charge.

Mr. STEENERSON. But he has not the authority.

Mr. FESS. Then he would have told me to have gone to the party who did have the authority.

Mr. ROUSE. The fact is that you did not wait long enough to find out anything, is it not?

Mr. FESS. Well, if this committee wants to take that position, it is all right.

Mr. ROUSE. I know you want to be fair.

Mr. FESS. If you want to take that position, it is all right.

Mr. STEENERSON. The practice has been, Doctor, so far as I am acquainted with it, for the 13 or 14 years I have been here, to call on the chief of the bureau, and he sends for the Superintendent of Rural Delivery, or whatever it may be, and then the question is determined there.

Mr. FESS. Just let me ask the committee, do you suppose that I could get any consideration whatever if I should make an appointment with anybody in the department, or is this simply an administrative measure that emanates from one of the executive departments, and that a Member of Congress or this committee has nothing to do with it?

Mr. STEENERSON. I desire to say that, so far as I know, the administration of the Rural Devilery Service has not been a political matter, and so far as I know it is not a political matter under this administration. It is simply a question of policy that they have adopted, which turns out to be unwise, and the Congressmen should discuss that with the man in charge. My district has not been hit, but if it had been I certainly would have taken it up with him.

Mr. ROUSE. It seems to me, Doctor, in a matter of this importance you should be willing to wait more than 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. You called on Mr. Wood, did you, Doctor?

Mr. FESS. Yes; and did not get to see him.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Wood is a very nice gentleman and a very efficient officer, and I am sure he would show you any kind of courtesy. Then, too, he is a Republican, so of course he did not have any political reason in doing that.

Mr. FESS. I do not care anything about that.

Mr. COX. If you will call him on the telephone, Doctor, he will see you.

Mr. BRITT. Your direct business was with the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, so he could call the proper officer up, and I know Mr. Wood did not intentionally slight you.

Mr. FESS. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether he can express the judgment of the committee that my going to Mr. Blakslee would do any good at all in reference to my situation?

The CHAIRMAN. I believe so, Doctor. I could not speak for the committee, but personally I believe it would be all right.

Mr. BRITT. I think you should make your case fully known to Mr. Blakslee.

Mr. STEENERSON. I think that is the trouble with this administration, that there have not been enough Congressmen who have gone to Mr. Blakslee.

Mr. AYRES. Have the inspectors inspected the contemplated new routes?

Mr. FESS. Not to my knowledge. I have asked the postmaster at Xenia post office, but he has no information. I want to thank you for being very polite and considerate of me. I have perhaps been rather bitter at some points.

Mr DOWELL. With reference to one route, I answered that it was a horse route. There are, however, a number of motor routes in the State of Iowa and in my district.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. CHURCH].

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, I take this opportunity to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to say a few words about the Rural Delivery Service. Along in the early fall, about the 1st of September, the reorganization of the Rural Delivery Service reached Georgia and the motorization of the Rural Service commenced to take place. I have given a very close study to this question of rural delivery and the use of the automobile in the carrying of the rural mails. The trouble about the Rural Delivery Service with the motor car instead of the horse-drawn vehicle is this, and we must admit it, and I think the Post Office Department will admit it: I believe that it is unwise, that it is not economical, to attempt to carry the rural mails over roads of such character where the motor car can not be used 365 days in the year. I do not think it is fair to the people that are being served, and I do not think it is fair to the carrier. First, it is not fair to the people, and they are the ones we are primarily interested in. Rural Delivery Service in my section of the country means personal contact with the carrier. If the roads are in such condition that in clear and good weather the carrier can use an automobile, but in bad weather he is forced to use a horse-drawn vehicle, you will find that it is impossible for the patrons of the road to know within an hour or an hour and a half when the rural carrier will come along, because, of course, there is going to be a difference in his schedule. Take a man in the country, for instance, that uses the parcel post. He lives probably a quarter or a half a mile out of sight of the road the route is on. He has to go down in sight at least of the road, and he does not know on a given day whether the carrier is coming with a motor car or a horse-drawn vehicle. In the event he uses a motor car he will get there an hour or an hour and a half sooner than if he uses a horse-drawn vehicle. Then, it is not fair to the carrier where this can not be done regularly, and for this reason, as was suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The carrier has to maintain a motor car and he has to maintain at least one horse and buggy, and on the days that he can not deliver the mail over the 50-mile route with a motor car he has to employ an additional substitute. That is to say, he has to maintain a horse and buggy, and he has got to maintain the motor car, and in addition to that on the days when he can not use the motor car he is obliged to employ a substitute to take the other end of the route and serve it.

I have an amendment here which I desire to offer at the proper place and time when the bill is under consideration, under the five-minute rule, which I believe will do much to increase the efficiency of the Rural Delivery Service. It is practical, and I want to explain it. I will send it to the desk and ask that the Clerk read it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of rural carriers, substitutes for rural carriers on annual leave, clerks in charge of rural stations, and tolls and ferriage, Rural Delivery Service, and for the incidental expenses thereof, $48,500,000: Provided, That not to exceed $20,000 of the amount hereby appropriated may be used for the compensation of clerks in charge of rural stations: And provided further, That on and after July 1, 1916, rural carriers shall receive a salary not exceeding $2,200 per annum, and their maximum salary shall be based on the length of their routes, the time required to serve them, and the number of pieces and weight of mail transported: And provided further, That on and after July 1, 1916, the minimum compensation of rural carriers shall be as follows: On routes of 24 miles and over, six times a week, $1,200 per annum, payable monthly; on routes 22 miles and less than 24 miles, $1,152; on routes 20 miles and less than 22 miles, $1,080; on routes 18 miles and less than 20 miles, $960; on routes 16 miles and less than 18 miles, $840; on routes 14 miles and less than 16 miles, $720; on routes 12 miles and less than 14 miles, $672; on routes 10 miles and less than 12 miles, $624; on routes 8 miles and less than 10 miles, $576; on routes 6 miles and less than 8 miles, $528; on routes 4 miles and less than 6 miles, $480. A rural carrier serving one tri-weekly route shall be paid on the basis for a route one-half the length of the route served by him, and a carrier serving two tri-weekly routes shall be paid on the basis for a route one-half of the combined length of the two routes.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, the only change in the present law that that makes is this: I make the minimum salaries of the carriers the maximum salaries they receive now. For instance, the carrier on the standard route of 24 miles would receive $1,200. I think I know something about the practical end of this and I will tell you what it is. My experience in Congress, and I think it is the experience of practically every Member, has been that when a rural delivery route is 24 miles long and you have an application from constituents to get additional service, you find that in eight instances out of ten there will be lodged in the department an adverse report on an extension of that service. The reason for that is this: The carrier has absolutely no incentive to take on an additional amount of mileage, because he does not get an additional penny for this additional service. The result has been that when this administration went out and through its inspectors commenced to inspect the Rural Delivery Service, it found that hundreds and hundreds of families could be served in this country who were not being served at their door because of the fact that these routes did not lap over to meet the next route and the families between the standard routes received no efficient service. Here is what this amendment does. If we are going to have the parcel post, let us have an effectual parcel post. That is my idea about it. Every carrier in the United States to-day has absolutely no incentive to increase the Parcel Post Service of the country. His pay is not based on what he does. If he goes out and takes in a mile or 2 miles more which he can serve with a horse-drawn vehicle in certain localities he gets no more for it, and, therefore, the carrier, being human, does not want to take on an additional burden unless he gets some additional compensation.

And the result is that there are hundreds and hundreds of families in this country that are getting no service at all that would get service if these rural carriers became real boosters for the Government instead of holding back when they reach a certain standard pay. Now, this reward is held out, the maximum salary that can be obtained. It looks big. It is $2,200 a year. Suppose a carrier goes out and takes on a mile and a half over the 24 miles. He gets in proportion to that mile and a half or 2 miles the additional service that he is willing to render, about $50 a mile per annum. That is about what it will amount to. In other words, if he takes on 25 miles and the service justifies it, the department will pay him probably between $40 and $50 additional. It is according to the increased business the Government gets and it puts it on a business basis and it settles for ever and a day this question of rural delivery service. I believe as firmly as I believe I am living that there is not any carrier in the country who can take one horse and cover a route 31 or 32 miles a day and last at it. If a carrier covers a route of 31 or 32 miles a day he is supposed to have two horses and alternate with them and it is an additional expense on him and he gets no additional pay.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman has made a study of this rural carrier service. In my district we have some complaint from the carriers in getting vehicles large enough to carry the parcel post at times. The complaint is that it piles up and some days they have to leave some of their parcel post until the next day. Has the gentleman any information about how the carriers take care of their mail and parcel post on these long routes?

Mr. HOWARD. Well, the truth of the business is, I think that is what brought the department to the automobile service. The people see a man coming along with a little piano-box buggy just big enough to get both of his feet in and he has no room to carry parcel post, and they do not think of using the parcel post like they would if they had some equipment for the handling of extensive parcel-post business. If the carrier got in that case in conformity with what he carried in parcel post he would go out and be the agent of the Government in inducing people to use the parcel post, because he would get additional pay. I tell you that my solemn judgment is that until the carrier is paid in conformity with the service rendered, and only in conformity with the service rendered, that the Rural Delivery Service will never become as efficient an arm of the Government as it should become. Now I will yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY].

Mr. FINLEY. I understand the gentleman's position to be that as the length of the route is increased the incentive to the carrier to work up the parcel post will be increased accordingly?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir; and not only on the increased mileage assumed but along the entire route.

Mr. FINLEY. Well, I do not quite catch the logic of the gentleman's position. I would like for him to explain that.

Mr. HOWARD. The logic of it is just the same as the logic that moves the gentleman from South Carolina to accept one side of a law case where the fee in one case is $1,000 and on the other side it is $500, and the gentleman has both sides offered to him. What would he do? [Laughter.] Now, that is in answer to your whole rural-delivery proposition. If you will put the carrier's pay on a basis that he will get pay in conformity with the service rendered, there is no question about what the carrier will do. He would be a drone in the service if he did not go out and try to increase not only his number of patrons but increase the mileage, increase the use of the parcel post, and build up his route, because of the fact that the returns to the Government would fix the increase in the pay that this carrier would receive; and along that basis this amendment of mine seeks to remedy the evil that the department is trying to correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. HOWARD. With pleasure.

Mr. DOWELL. Would you advise the extension of the routes beyond what they have been extended in the rearrangement and readjustment?

Mr. HOWARD. You mean beyond 30 miles for horse-drawn vehicles and 50 miles for the motor car?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. It would be a question entirely, I will say to the gentleman, of the condition of the roads. I think that is primarily the consideration to be taken cognizance of in the establishment of rural delivery service, and as to the character of the vehicle, whether horse drawn or motor driven.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield me about five minutes more?

Mr. MOON. I hardly have it, but I reckon I had better let you go along if you will explain the maximum amount you want to pay the carrier.

Mr. DOWELL. May I ask you just one more question here?

Mr. HOWARD. I thank the gentleman from Tennessee for the courtesy. I thought the gentleman had seen the answer to it, it is so plain.

Mr. DOWELL. Should not the length of the route depend entirely upon the conditions and circumstances around that route?

Mr. HOWARD. I do. I think that is true. And I think every rural route in the United States has its own individuality; that is to say, I do not think there are any two of them in the country which are exactly alike.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And ought not the pay of the carrier to be based on the weight of the parcel, whatever the service performed?

Mr. HOWARD. I will tell you what I think about it. I think this: That weight, the number of pieces, and distance should control the carriers' pay, and I think that any other basis in the world is unfair. And I will tell you another thing, gentlemen: The rural carriers have not got any "snap." They go in all sorts of weather, but I do think that $1,200, the maximum for a 24-mile route, taking into consideration the sparsely settled sections of the country, is pretty good pay for the rural carrier, if he serves that route with the horse-drawn equipment.

Now, here is what brought about this motor-car service. I am going to answer the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] right now.

Mr. MOON. I will ask you what is the maximum that you fix in your amendment?

Mr. HOWARD. The maximum pay—and I am going to be frank with the committee about it, because I hope some gentlemen will study the amendment—the minimum pay under this amendment would be $2,200. Now, I am willing to say that not many carriers in the United States within the next year or two would reach that maximum of $2,200 under the provisions of that amendment. Why? Because when he got over 24 miles, what he received in addition to the maximum pay as now established would be predicated entirely upon the amount of return to the Government; that is to say, if the number of patrons increased, if his weight increased, if his distance, if the number of pieces of mail increased under this amendment, he would get increased pay; but if he carried the minimum number of pieces of mail and served the minimum number of patrons, on a standard route of 24 miles, he would not receive an additional penny. It is purely an administrative matter, left entirely in the hands of the department, on which they act in conformity with the present minimum pay. That is the amendment as I intend it.

Mr. MOON. You think your amendment would not affect more than a few carriers?

Mr. HOWARD. I would not say that it would not affect but few eventually. If it did not, it would be a mighty poor amendment. And I will say this, that I think it will eventually affect thousands of rural carriers in the country, but I do not think a great many will ever attain the $2,200 maximum pay provided for in this amendment.

Mr. MOON. The maximum pay now provided is $1,200.

Mr. HOWARD. Twelve hundred dollars; yes, sir. That is the limit under my amendment, unless he takes on additional burdens. In that case the Government is reimbursed in additional returns in revenue. But this is an incentive. It is the reward that is held out, and, as I say, this possibly will take 25, 26, 27, and in some instances 28 miles, with a horse-drawn vehicle, and will do away with these experiments with motorization of service where it can not be done. Additional mileage will, of course, eventually culminate in consolidation, but in that case they would be efficient consolidations, for the carriers themselves would bring them about in an effort to increase their salaries. They would be "boosters" for "Uncle Sam" and his mail service instead of dissatisfied "knockers" of the service.

Mr. BEAKES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. BEAKES. Can the gentleman explain how the maximum of pay can be increased and still reduce the total amount of the appropriation?

Mr. HOWARD. Why, yes; I will tell the gentleman how I can do it. It is very easily done. All the carriers will endeavor to take on more mileage to get more pay, and in the thickly populated States consolidations will take place that will balance the appropriation, and instead of decreasing the efficiency it would increase the efficiency, for the carrier and the patron would be the applicants for the increased service and all would work smoothly and harmoniously, and the poor Congressman would quit being cussed every time the department made a change in a rural route; and I did it for the further reason that I do not want the amendment to be subject to a point of order. I wanted it voted on. That is the reason. If the gentleman wants to put it up to within a hundred thousand dollars of what is in the bill, I have no objection; but if you will vote for my amendment you find that many of the difficult matters heretofore dealt with by your able committee will be eliminated from future discussions of the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. BEAKES. You want to incur a deficiency in that appropriation?

Mr. HOWARD. Not at all.

Mr. BEAKES. Then you want a number of rural routes cut out?

Mr. HOWARD. No. The department, in its estimates, estimated for $4,500,000 less than the committee recommends.

Mr. BEAKES. Yes. They estimated that on the saving of the routes.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not go into the reason of it. If you want to put it within a hundred thousand dollars of what the committee recommended, I have no objection, for I am the last man in this House who would vote to impair the Rural Delivery Service. I am endeavoring to increase its usefulness and efficiency, and I believe this amendment will do so. I will further discuss it under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RAINEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10484, the Post Office appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DENISON, for five days, on account of matters pertaining to the public business.

To Mr. PARKER of New York, indefinitely, on account of death in his family.

To Mr. HUGHES, indefinitely, on account of the serious illness of his son;

To Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri, five days, on account of matters pertaining to the public business.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. House joint resolution 112, providing for a committee to investigate certain matters relating to the matériel of the Army and Navy, treating of several things in general and nothing in particular, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, because there was a good deal in it about the Navy; but it provides for the appointment of a committee instead of a commission, and it ought to be referred to the Committee on Rules. Without objection, the change of reference is made.

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 16, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Acting Secretary of War submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required for the service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917 (H. Doc. No. 692); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a draft of legislation relating to the extension of the Federal building at Grand Rapids, Mich., in order to overcome crowded condition of the post-office quarters (H. Doc. No. 693); to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting draft of legislation relative to the post-office building at Poughkeepsie, N. Y. (H. Doc. No. 694); to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Acting Secretary of War submitting estimates of deficiencies in appropriations required by the Board of Managers, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, for the services of the fiscal years 1915 and 1916 (H. Doc. No. 695); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Acting Secretary of War submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the purchase of land at Coronado Heights, Cal., for aviation-school purposes (H. Doc. No. 696); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

6. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting draft of provision and requesting that the same be inserted in the next deficiency appropriation bill, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to expend $2,500 from the "Contingent and miscellaneous expenses, Hydrographic Office, 1916," for repairing building rented by Navy Department (H. Doc. No. 697); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

7. A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of Clatskanie River, Oreg., from Clatskanie City to the Columbia River (H. Doc. No. 698); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

8. A letter from the governor of Federal Reserve Board, transmitting second annual report of the Federal Reserve Board for the period ended December 31, 1915 (H. Doc. No. 442); to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed.

9. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting a special estimate of appropriation to cover cost of repairing bridges, roads, trails, buildings, etc., in National Park Reservation, Okla. (H. Doc. No. 699); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

10. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Acting Secretary of War, submitting supplemental estimates of appropriations for the service of the Panama Canal, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917 (H. Doc. No. 700); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

11. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Acting Secretary of War, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917 (H. Doc. No. 701); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. IGOE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8028) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 196), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. DILLON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 3144) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pend Oreille River, between the towns of Metaline and Metaline Falls, in the State of Washington, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 197), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8248) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pend Oreille River, between the towns of Metaline and Metaline Falls, Wash., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 198), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. CARAWAY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10312) relating to appeals and writs of error and costs thereof, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 199), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8246) to revive the right of action under the act of March 12, 1863 (12 Stat. L., p. 820), reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 200), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9635) for the relief of the estate of Williamson Page, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 194), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. RUSSELL of Ohio, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8630) for the relief of the Farmer's State Bank, of Eureka, Woodford County, Ill., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 195), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, adverse reports were delivered to the Clerk and laid on the table, as follows:

Mr. RUSSELL of Ohio, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7416) granting relief to Robert J. Shields, reported the same adversely, accompanied by a report (No. 192), which said bill and report were laid on the table.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2611) for the relief of William T. Roche, reported the same adversely, accompanied by a report (No. 193), which said bill and report were laid on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 975) granting a pension to Emeline Vanata; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 4907) granting a pension to Michael E. McGrath; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 16, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thy name is our defense and our inspiration. Thou art our sun and our shield. Our little systems have their day; they have their day and cease to be. That which gives stability and permanency is the unchanging order of Thy kingdom. That which gives dignity and glory to our human obligation is our relation to the unchanging covenant of God. Help us to enter heartily and fully into the covenant that Thou hast made with us, that we may keep Thy law, that we may be governed by Thy will, and that we may accomplish Thy purpose on earth. We ask for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1 to the bill (H. R. 9416) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior years, and for other purposes, and agrees to the same; insists upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 5, 11, and 14; agrees to the further conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FITZGERALD, Mr. EAGAN, and Mr. CANNON conferees on the part of the House.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GALLINGER presented petitions of the Building Trades Department, American Federation of Labor, and the International Association of Machinists, of Washington, D. C., praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a petition of the Ministerial Association of Manchester, N. H., praying for an increase in armaments, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I present a resolution adopted by the House of Delegates of the Legislature of Virginia and ask that it be read.

There being no objection, the resolution was read and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

Whereas Virginia as a sovereign State, but an integral part of this great Nation, has never and will never justify war, except as acting in the defense of well-defined human rights, and to this end only, has always and does now believe in preparedness: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the House of Delegates of the General Assembly of Virginia hereby indorses the action of our great President in stirring the minds of the people of this country to a sense of duty along the lines indicated, and that they commend the untiring efforts of our Committee on Military Affairs in both Houses of our National Congress to reach the desired end without committing the United States of America to militarism.

Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the Virginia delegation in both Houses of the Congress of the United States.

Agreed to by house of delegates February 4, 1916.

JOHN W. WILLIAMS,
Clerk House of Delegates.

Mr. PITTMAN presented a petition of the Commercial Club of Reno, Nev., praying for the regulation of all railroad rates by the Interstate Commerce Commission, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I beg to offer sundry petitions for reference. In presenting a petition from some people in a small city of California against increasing the Army, at the same time I present a petition for an increased garrison at Monterey, Cal., one of the most exposed harbors near San Francisco. The right of petition is sacred, but the right of self-defense is not less sacred. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Canners' League of California, praying for the enactment of legislation to impose certain duties on interstate carriers regarding shipment of fruit, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Orange County Bankers' Association, of California, praying for the enactment of legislation to provide certain changes in the Federal reserve law, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Hollister, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to promote the use of peanut and cottonseed oil for human consumption, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented memorials of sundry citizens of Texas, remonstrating against an increase in armaments, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Washington, D. C., and a petition of 261 citizens of Petersburg, Alaska, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of 261 citizens of Petersburg, Alaska, praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FLETCHER presented a petition of the Gadsden County Tobacco Growers' Union, of Quincy, Fla., praying that an appropriation be made for the investigation of conditions in the raising of tobacco, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. BECKHAM presented petitions of sundry citizens of Kentucky, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HARDING presented petitions of sundry citizens of Ohio, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McLEAN presented petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Unions of Waterbury, Willimantic, and Winsted; of Local Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of East Hampton; and of sundry citizens of East Windsor, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for Federal censorship of motion pictures, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the People's Presbyterian Church, of Bridgeport, Conn., and a petition of sundry citizens of Stamford, Conn., praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Central Pomona Grange, No. 1, Patrons of Husbandry, of Berlin, Conn., praying for the creation of a system of rural credits, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the German-American Alliance of Waterbury, Conn., remonstrating against the seizure of mails by the British Government and praying for the placing of an embargo on the exportation of munitions of war, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of Riverside Council, No. 26, Knights of Columbus, of Windsor Locks, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation to make October 12 a legal holiday, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Greenwich, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit interstate commerce in the products of child labor, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of James W. Milne Camp, No. 14, United Spanish War Veterans, of Rockville, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation to grant pensions to widows and orphans of veterans of the Spanish-American War, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming presented petitions of sundry citizens of Luck, Glen Rock, and Riverton, all in the State of Wyoming, praying for an increase in armaments, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SHIVELY presented petitions of the congregations of the United Brethren Church of Marshall, of the official board of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Peru, and of sundry citizens of Montpelier and Tyner, all in the State of Indiana, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SALT FORK BRIDGE, OKLAHOMA.

Mr. OWEN. I ask to have the bill (S. 3423) to provide for the construction of a bridge across the Salt Fork of the Arkansas River, near White Eagle Agency, in the Ponca Indian Reservation, Okla., which was improperly referred to the Committee on Commerce, sent to the Committee on Indian Affairs. The bill ought not to have gone to the Committee on Commerce, and I should like to have it referred to the proper committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Committee on Commerce is discharged from the further consideration of the bill and it will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

EMPLOYMENT OF STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. SHAFROTH. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report back favorably with an amendment Senate resolution 95, submitted by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and I ask for the consideration of it at this time, as the hearings are to begin tomorrow.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment was, in lines 3 and 4, to strike out the words "to send for persons, books, and papers; to administer oaths, and," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-fourth Congress to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expense thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION OF GASOLINE.

Mr. SMOOT. Yesterday, on the request of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the supplement to the annual report of the Attorney General of the United States for the year 1915, upon the litigation over withdrawn oil lands in the United States, was ordered to be printed as a Senate document.

I find that the document has already been printed by the House—Document No. 593, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session. That being the case, I ask that the vote by which the order was made to have it printed as a Senate document be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is vacated.

THE GUARANTY FUND.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I present a pamphlet entitled "Six Years of the Guaranty Fund, Its Operation and Effect," by Hon. John S. Patterson, late commissioner of insurance and banking of the State of Texas. I ask that the pamphlet be referred to the Committee on Printing with a view to its publication as a document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 4494) to authorize the acceptance and administration of savings by the Postal Savings Bank Service of the Post Office Department for crescent life annuities; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. CLAPP:

A bill (S. 4503) for the relief of Fred Klossner; and

A bill (S. 4504) for the relief of Edward J. Klossner; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 4505) appropriating money to equip Puget Sound Navy Yard for battleship construction; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. BRYAN:

A bill (S. 4506) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. HARDING:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 99) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to grant the free use, for military drill, of any discarded rifles to any duly accredited camps of the Sons of Veterans Reserve; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MANUFACTURE OF ARMOR.

Mr. TILLMAN submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1417) to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

B. F. YOAKUM.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, several days ago in some remarks I made I took occasion to refer, among other things, to the financial conditions that brought about the wrecking of what is known as the Frisco Railroad System. In some way there seems to have been an impression that in those remarks I intended to cast some reflection upon Mr. B. F. Yoakum. I have received a letter in which such a statement is made. I desire to say that I had no intention whatever of casting any reflection upon Mr. Yoakum, and I do not believe that I did so, but in order to give the matter full publicity I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a copy of a letter I have written in reply to such an inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

FEBRUARY 16, 1916.

WILLIAM C. NIBLACK, Esq.,
Chicago Title & Trust Co. Building, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of February 14, inclosing newspaper clipping in which it is charged that in a speech on the floor of the Senate I denounced Mr. B. F. Yoakum personally with being responsible for the deplorable financial condition of the Frisco road generally. In reply permit me to say: In the speech referred to I was advocating certain legislation in regard to the regulation of the financial management of interstate railroads. In the course of my remarks I used the wrecking of the New Haven road, the Rock Island road, and the Frisco System as illustrations tending to show the need of the legislation I was advocating. I was complaining entirely of the financial operations of these and other systems of railroads. I distinctly disavowed any intention of criticizing the operating department of any railroad. I have never regarded Mr. Yoakum as a financial operator. In a general way I have known him by reputation as a builder of railroads and my understanding is that he has been very successful in this respect. I presume in his building operations he was himself often compelled to submit to the dictation of men of large wealth, who by their control of financial matters were able to manipulate stocks and bonds of the various roads he was engaged in building. I have never attempted to investigate Mr. Yoakum. As far as I know he has been perfectly honest in all his railroad operations, and I have never made any charge to the contrary.

Yours, very truly,

G. W. NORRIS.

Mr. OWEN subsequently said: Mr. President, my attention has been called to a letter which was put in the RECORD this morning by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] in regard to the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Co., in which the writer attributed the difficulties of the Frisco System to the very high cost of the money which had been used in that service. My attention was drawn to this matter some time ago by reason of the fact that there are 2,500 miles of this system in Oklahoma. In going through the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission of December 26, 1914, I find that they have set forth there the reasons for the financial difficulties of that system, from which I have made extracts, comprising a little over a page of matter, which I ask may go into the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to by Mr. OWEN is as follows:

"Notwithstanding this apparent exhausted financial condition and inability to meet obligations without recourse to further borrowing, the Frisco sold to Speyer & Co., of New York, shortly before the receivers were appointed, $3,000,000 of its general lien 5s, at a price of 78 cents.

"The sale of securities to the investing public through the bankers at a time when every appearance indicated the insolvency of the issuing company invites and warrants condemnation of all those who participated in such sale. Speyer & Co. should have been aware of the poverty of the Frisco, as they advanced that company on April 24, $725,000 on its demand note, and $50,000 on its demand note dated April 29, and applied the proceeds of the sale of $1,000,000 of these bonds to the liquidation of these notes."

The report further says, "The difficulties of the Frisco were of a financial and not of an operating character."

The commission found "that the discount on bonds and notes, including premiums paid for retirement of underlying issues and commissions paid banks or bankers, amounted to $32,387,033.80, from which should be deducted premiums obtained in the exchange of one form of securities for the retirement of others amounting to $1,486,852.25, leaving a net balance of $30,900,181.55 discount borne by the Frisco since its refunding operations in 1901."

The commission's report also shows that through the purchase of the Kansas City, Fort Scott & Memphis there was a total increase in the funded debt of $13,737,510, while $28,510,000 of capital stock of the new company was issued in lieu of $12,900,600 of stock of the old company, or a total increase in capital of $29,346,910, against an increase in mileage of approximately 131½ miles.

The report states further, "Organizing the new company and disposing of the securities through the syndicate was not a labor of love on the part of those composing the syndicate." This syndicate was handled by J. & W. Seligman & Co., who were large participants in same.

Mr. OWEN. I have known Mr. Yoakum for many years, and regard him not only as one of the very great constructive men of the United States and as an honest, courageous, and most laborious man as well. His services, while already greatly appreciated, will be more and more valued by the great Southwest, where his pioneering labors have established thousands of miles of busy steel highways and made possible hundreds of thousands of productive American homes. We need more men like Yoakum in American railroad pioneering.

He has been charged with dealing unjustly with the sale to the Frisco of various constructed lines. I made an inquiry with regard to this matter, and received a letter from Mr. Yoakum with regard to his conduct in this case. I also made a request from Mr. Clark of the Interstate Commerce Commission, who had given special investigation to this question under a Senate resolution, and from him I obtained a reply. I wish to place those letters in the RECORD for the information of those who are concerned in the matter and for the information of the country, the matter having been very much bruited throughout the press.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

LETTER OF B. F. YOAKUM, ESQ., TO SENATOR OWEN RELATIVE TO HIS CONNECTION WITH THE CONSTRUCTION OF THE FRISCO SYSTEM.

FEBRUARY 10, 1916.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Several times within the last two years the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Co. has been the subject of discussion in the Senate. Over 1,400 miles of the Frisco System is in Oklahoma, and a large proportion of the mileage constructed which came under the investigation by the Interstate Commerce Commission under a Senate resolution of June 10, 1913, was railroad constructed in that State. I want to call your attention to some of the facts and to the importance of these newly constructed railroads in the formation of the Frisco system, in connection with the report made to the United States Senate by the Interstate Commerce Commission on January 20, 1914. And to enable me to specifically place the matter before you, I am handing you a map showing each railroad reported upon by the Interstate Commerce Commission, each railroad being numbered to correspond with the number of the commission's report.

NO. 1.—THE OKLAHOMA CITY & WESTERN RAILROAD CO.

This line was constructed in 1901, the construction period being from 1901 to 1903, and extending from Oklahoma City to Quanah, in the Panhandle of Texas. The extension of this line west from Oklahoma City to Texas was necessary to open up that section of country then without a line from that territory to the Mississippi River and southeast territory.

NO. 2.—THE ST. LOUIS, SAN FRANCISCO & NEW ORLEANS RAILROAD CO.

This line, extending from Ardmore, Okla., to the long-leaf-pine district of Arkansas and Louisiana, furnishes tonnage for return loading in addition to opening a good country along the Red River on its Oklahoma side. It was the intention, as you will observe from the map, to carry this line through to a connection with lines extending into the Panhandle of Texas to enable the Frisco to haul lumber into that section. Part of the grading was finished but the gap was not built. The construction period was from 1901 to 1902.

NO. 3.—THE ST. LOUIS & GULF RAILROAD.

The St. Louis & Gulf and St. Louis, Memphis & Southeastern were composed of nine small lines between St. Louis, through southeastern Missouri and Memphis. In the rich Mississippi Delta I could see a territory which with proper transportation facilities would, and has with transportation, become one of the most productive sections of the State of Missouri. The Mississippi Valley west of the river was then served by these disconnected and poorly built roads, with light rails and ties laid on the surface in some instances. Each of these poorly constructed short roads was running only mixed freight and passenger trains, none of them paying operating expenses and giving very poor service to the public. This was one of the most risky enterprises engaged in. I took it up originally on my personal responsibility, assuming obligations and finally gathered the properties together and put them in shape. These Mississippi River lines are now giving to the public the best of service, both freight and passenger, and the rich alluvial valley west of the Mississippi River, through the construction of these railroads, is developing rapidly. While separate accounts are not kept of these lines, taking the tonnage of the main line between St. Louis and Memphis and applying the system rate per ton per mile between those points the road is now earning approximately $10,000 per mile. This tells what this railroad has done for the public and the Frisco.

A syndicate was formed, composed of 50 people, who were almost exclusively St. Louis citizens, who carried the risk in the overflow district of the Mississippi Valley for more than two years. In getting these several small lines together I agreed with Judge Medill, now deceased, that I would do certain things, which, if I had failed, would have cost me considerable money. But instead, through these disconnected lines, the foundation was laid for the building of the line into St. Louis and putting into operation one of the best component lines now forming the Frisco System.

NO. 4.—THE ST. LOUIS & OKLAHOMA CITY RAILROAD.

This line extends from Sapulpa, Okla., to Oklahoma City, and construction was finished in 1899 and its importance to the Frisco can be clearly seen by looking at the map.

NO. 5.—THE ST. LOUIS, OKLAHOMA & SOUTHERN RAILWAY CO.

This line was constructed from Sapulpa, Okla., to Red River, Tex., and was completed in 1900. The construction of this line was necessary and of the greatest importance to the Frisco. In addition to traversing a good country, which has since by reason of the transportation furnished developed so rapidly that it has become one of the most prosperous sections of the State of Oklahoma, and this line has also become the strong line of the Frisco between Kansas City and Missouri River territory and from Texas.

NO. 6.—ARKANSAS VALLEY & WESTERN RAILROAD CO.

In order to secure a connection with the Santa Fe and engage in an interchange of traffic with that company, and from which company we were receiving but little California business, we built a line from Tulsa to Avard, Okla. This line furnishes through transcontinental service between the Mississippi Valley and the Pacific coast, and has proven to be of much value to the Frisco System.

NO. 7.—NEW IBERIA & NORTHERN.

The New Iberia & Northern and the St. Mary & Eastern Railroads are in what is known as the Teche country, the best sugar lands of Louisiana. The construction of these lines was originated by others, and I took an interest in them for the Frisco. Thereafter, by resolution of the board of directors of the Frisco, I turned over my entire interest to the Frisco. After the receivership this transaction was referred to by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and while I do not agree with their conclusions I agreed to take back the entire interest, both for amounts past due and those to become due.

The wisdom of the construction of the New Iberia & Northern by its builders is justified by the fact that arrangements are now being made for the extension of this line into New Orleans at a cost of approximately $3,000,000. When completed it will form an important link of a through line from New Orleans into Mexico, and as far west as California, forming a new transcontinental line in connection with the Santa Fe with as short a mileage to the Pacific coast as that of the Southern Pacific.

NO. 8.—COLORADO, SOUTHERN, NEW ORLEANS & PACIFIC.

The Colorado, Southern, New Orleans & Pacific, extending from New Orleans to Houston, was acquired by the Frisco in 1906; also the Orange & Northwestern and the Beaumont, Sour Lake & Western, the latter forming part of the through main line between New Orleans and Houston.

NO. 9.—CHICAGO & EASTERN ILLINOIS.

The purchase of the stock of the Chicago & Eastern Illinois, as shown in the report of the commission, was acquired by the Frisco in 1902.

NO. 10.—KANSAS CITY, FORT SCOTT & MEMPHIS.

The purchase of the stock of the Kansas City, Fort Scott & Memphis was made in 1901, as shown in report of the commission.

NO. 11.—ST. LOUIS, BROWNSVILLE & MEXICO.

When I first took up the construction of this railroad known as the "Gulf Coast Line," it was after I had made a personal investigation and discovered, as it were, one of the most fertile sections of country on the Western Hemisphere without transportation facilities—the lower Rio Grande Valley of Texas. Prior to the building of this railroad Brownsville, Tex., was 150 miles from any American railroad. Therefore it goes without saying that that fertile country could not have grown or developed any more in the future than it had for the past 50 years without transportation, while with transportation and the railroad to push its development there are to-day over 300,000 acres in cultivation along the Gulf coast country as the result of this new line, of which 85,000 acres are now under irrigation from the waters of the Rio Grande River.

To finance the construction of the first 150 miles of this new railroad required $2,400,000 to start with, and with Col. S. W. Fordyce and others I subscribed $600,000 to guarantee its financing and construction, afterwards reducing my subscription to $300,833.33. During the construction of this line into Houston, Tex., my obligations in other directions largely increased this sum.

During the construction period—covering seven years—of these lines along the coast of Louisiana and Texas we encountered many unforeseen difficulties—war in Mexico and overflows from unprecedented floods.

During this construction I visited Mexico City and spent 10 days negotiating a contract with Mr. Limantour, minister of finance, and Mr. Brown, president of the National Lines of Mexico, and with the approval of President Diaz of Mexico we reached an understanding on the interchange of traffic through the Brownsville-Matamoros gateway, which resulted in the construction of the international bridge across the Rio Grande River. The construction of this bridge was financed through the same interests who constructed the St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico, with one-half of the stock, which is equal control, being owned by the National Lines of Mexico. I mention this so that you may know how far-reaching our plans were to build up the Frisco System, and which was only prevented through disastrous floods and war that could not be foreseen by human agencies.

Within a few months after the bridge was finished and a connection established with the National Lines of Mexico the interchange of traffic to and from Mexico was exceedingly promising; in fact, had started off with a good business, but within a few months, under the revolutionary wars, the railroad tracks and bridges in Mexico were destroyed, operation of the Mexican lines practically discontinued, and, in spite of a large business that we had commenced to handle and the large business in sight through the Brownsville-Matamoros gateway, all that lucrative business was entirely shut off, and has remained so ever since.

In connection with the Brownsville Railroad I want to call your attention to a letter from the Hon. Allison Mayfield, chairman of the Railroad Commission of Texas, of January 21, 1916, in which he says: "The Texas Railroad Commission had the Brownsville road examined by its engineers and experts, and the valuation as of date June 20, 1911, was $11,874,951.92," which valuation by the Texas Railroad Commission is in excess of the price which the Frisco paid for the Brownsville Railroad.

The construction of all the lines in Oklahoma, Missouri, Arkansas, and Texas built by and for the Frisco between 1896 and 1903 amounted to more than $49,000,000, and the profits to directors, who assumed large obligations and took their chances, was less than $900,000 in the upbuilding of these magnificent properties during a period of 16 years. The wisdom of the location and construction of these lines is now demonstrated by the fact that they are component parts of one of the best railroads west of the Mississippi River, which through the efforts of its officers and close working relations with every community it serves has accomplished more in the upbuilding and development of the southwestern country than any other system of railroads.

The Frisco Railroad System as it now stands is the work of 16 years of my life. It has grown from eleven hundred miles to over 5,000 miles, extending its rails into western territory, in many cases where it was from 20 to 40 miles between houses, which same territory to-day has over 100,000 farm homes, where prosperous people in comfortable homes are living and employing their time in growing foodstuff for the balance of the world.

These railroads could not have been constructed through the then sparsely settled southwestern country in any other way except through independent organizations, and it was necessary in some cases, as shown in the commission's report, to enable me to procure the funds for building these lines to take an interest, showing my faith in the enterprises, and to become personally responsible for my share of obligations and commitments. If we had depended on procuring funds to construct in any other way, the splendid Frisco Railroad System would not have to-day been in existence. I should naturally have preferred to have had these roads constructed by others, provided it could have been done under some arrangement through which the Frisco could have had the benefit of an option when construction was completed.

Railroad building is, under the best conditions, a hazardous and risky investment. New railroads are built through countries undeveloped, and there is no way of foreseeing all the difficulties that may be encountered in the building up and development of a new country. With good soil, climate, and other natural resources, together with railroad transportation, the successful growth and development of a fertile country is assured. But how long it will take before wild lands will be cleared and put under cultivation, or how fast industries may spring up in a new country are unknown quantities, and it is the growth of such industries that a new railroad must look to for its traffic. Capital will not flow freely to such investments and assume the hazards and uncertainties connected with new railroad building through sparsely settled country unless there is offered some inducement for substantial return on investment of so uncertain a character.

Until some method through the Federal Government is devised that will be sufficiently broad and at the same time sufficiently restrictive to prevent undue capitalization, new railroad building will become almost a thing of the past. We are confronted with a dangerous situation to-day. Until within the last two or three years, for over 30 years the average annual railroad mileage constructed was about 6,000 miles. There is not at present a contract for railroad construction in this country, barring a few miles being built to fill in some small gaps. If this stoppage of railroad building continues for five years without construction of new mileage, using a yearly average of 6,000 miles will put us behind our normal construction 30,000 miles. This will create a congested condition, which will affect labor, business, and development to an extent that will become serious. This is a warning that Senators should seriously consider and find a way to prevent its occurrence.

In conclusion, the responsibility for building up the Frisco System as it stands to-day was a heavy one, and it fell largely upon me personally. Every piece of railroad construction that I induced others to engage in or subscribed to myself took the chance of failing in the undertaking, and resulting in losses to all subscribers, and when they were merged with the Frisco, it was upon terms considered to be a fair and reasonable figure.

These railroads were constructed for the purpose of building up a great railroad system and developing a great rich territory in the Southwest, then largely without railroads to aid in developing. It was a business undertaking which required heavy capital, tireless labor, thorough and systematic working out of details, and management. In every case we availed ourselves of the best possible advice, and with the best engineering contructors of the day combined to produce this property as it now stands.

In justice to myself and other directors of the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Co., I am anxious to ascertain beyond any question of doubt if, through the investigation which was made under the supervision of Commissioner Edgar E. Clark, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, anything was found which would warrant any different conclusion than that contained in a report made to the Hon. Walter H. Sanborn, judge of the United States Federal court, by special counsel appointed by Judge Sanborn to bring suit against the officers and directors of the Frisco, if, in their opinion, such suits could be maintained.

I am handing you herewith a copy of the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission; also a copy of the report referred to above, filed with the court, which report concludes with the following statement:

"We have failed to find, however, and judging by the information that we have, we do not believe that any of the directors of the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Co. have been guilty of any actual, willful, or intentional fraud in the administration of the affairs of the company."

Yours, very truly, B. F. YOAKUM.

Hon. ROBERT L. OWEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

LETTER ADDRESSED TO FRISCO STOCKHOLDERS BY B. F. YOAKUM, 1913.

NEW YORK, December 16, 1913.

To the FRISCO STOCKHOLDERS:

As the Frisco railway properties are now in the hands of receivers and its affairs are being investigated by the Interstate Commerce Commission, under the direction of the United States Senate, I desire to make the following statement.

I have tried to avoid undue length and to confine myself to those things which have been most criticized and to other facts of interest to you. It is not my desire to escape responsibility nor even to divide that responsibility with others.

I hand you herewith a map showing the following lines acquired by the Frisco. The lines indicated in blue I had a personal interest in (see below for details).

The lines indicated in red I had no personal interest in, viz:

Date.	Road.	Mileage.
1899	St. Louis & Oklahoma City	103.26
1902	Ozark & Cherokee Central	143.90
1902	Blackwell, Enid & Southwestern	251.43
1901	St. Louis, Oklahoma & Southern	207.26
1901	Red River, Texas & Southern	52.98
1906	Colorado Southern, New Orleans & Pacific (now New Orleans, Texas & Mexico)	466.96
1902	Chicago & Eastern Illinois	1,275.38

All of the lines shown on the map were acquired to fit into the Frisco System and to aid in the upbuilding of its business.

When the construction of these lines was undertaken in 1897, through the then sparsely settled country which has since been so largely developed through the agency of the Frisco, it was exceedingly difficult to get money for this pioneering work. Therefore the usual plan of forming syndicates to construct and finance such lines was adopted, and in order to show my faith in the undertakings, and to secure the necessary help, it became imperative for me to invest my own funds.

PROFITS FROM THE SYNDICATE SALES OF THE FOLLOWING RAILROADS.

My interest therein, which is verified by reports made at the hearing concerning the construction of these lines before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and by accurate data, is shown by the following:

Date.	Road.	Number of syndicate subscribers.	Amount of syndicate subscription.	My subscription.	My profits.	My profit, less 6 per cent interest on investment.
1902–1904	St. Louis & Gulf and St. Louis, Memphis & Southeastern	50	$2,700,000	$75,000.00	$38,187.45	$29,187.45
1903–1909	St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico	99	3,981,000	300,833.33	227,580.42	111,759.49
1902–1903	St. Louis, San Francisco & New Orleans	[1]50	5,300,000	50,000.00	7,900.00	3,900.00
1901–1903	Oklahoma City & Western	51	2,148,000	22,500.00	2,933.34	1,020.84
1902–1904	Arkansas Valley & Western	61	3,190,000	62,500.00	11,515.78	5,283.94
1909	New Iberia & Northern	38	1,250,000	300,000.00	None.	None.
	Total		18,569,000	810,833.33	288,116.99	151,151.72

[1] Estimated.

Outside of the above, I received $28,000 in 4½ per cent bonds from the St. Louis & Gulf Syndicate, and $37,500 in sale of the Gulf Construction Co. to the Colorado Southern, New Orleans & Pacific Railroad Co., as shown by me at the hearing in St. Louis.

These acquired railroad properties (12 in number) have all proved advantageous and profitable to the Frisco, with the possible exception of the Chicago & Eastern Illinois and the New Orleans, Texas & Mexico (the Gulf Coast Lines). Judged by results at the present time, these two properties do not appear profitable; but, considered from a broad, constructive standpoint, the larger plans in view, and the probable future earnings of these properties, I believe their purchase will be fully justified. Prospective and retrospective pictures are not always the same.

THE CHICAGO & EASTERN ILLINOIS RAILROAD.

The Frisco acquired a majority of the stock of the Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railroad Co. in October, 1902, and at the time of this acquisition I did not own any Chicago & Illinois stock, nor did I make any profit, directly or indirectly.

Chicago is the largest railroad and commercial center of the West. At the time railroads were being consolidated into large systems, and those without access to large railroad and commercial centers could not develop their traffic satisfactorily. It was the judgment of the board as well as myself that this investment would be advantageous to the Frisco, and while it has not been directly profitable, it has been indirectly of immense advantage, by reason of the gross earnings from interchange business which it probably would not have secured except through ownership of the Chicago & Eastern Illinois.

During the 11 years since the purchase of this property the Frisco has paid out on stock certificates approximately $1,700,000 more than it has received in dividends, or an average of about $150,000 a year. The interchange of traffic, however, has resulted in gross earnings to the Frisco of approximately $3,750,000 annually.

At the time of the purchase of the Chicago & Eastern Illinois it practically controlled the coal traffic of Illinois and Indiana to Chicago markets. Since that time the Southern Illinois, Big Four, and other railroads have extended their lines into that territory, and have become large carriers of coal tonnage into Chicago and other markets.

NEW ORLEANS, TEXAS & MEXICO RAILROAD CO.

The gap between St. Louis and Memphis completed, and the Chicago & Eastern Illinois acquired to give an entrance into the Great Lakes territory, it seemed necessary to cover the 385 miles south of Memphis to reach New Orleans and south Texas in carrying out the general plan of the system. We entered into negotiations for the use of the Iron Mountain south of Memphis, including a portion of the Texas & Pacific, but the Texas & Pacific never executed the contract. In the meantime the Frisco had made several preliminary surveys and permanent locations for construction of its own line giving it an entrance into New Orleans by way of Baton Rouge. Right of way for a portion of the line had been secured. The completion of this line south of Memphis is an important one and made more so by the opening of the Panama Canal, which will make the Frisco probably the most important transportation company in the distribution of commerce for all of the Mississippi Valley and territory tributary thereto. Mr. B. L. Winchell made a thorough investigation of the proposed line south of Memphis, and made reports showing its importance as a connecting link in the completion of the longest water-level-grade line in the country, extending from Chicago and St. Louis to the Gulf of Mexico and the Rio Grande.

The Brownsville Line—Houston to Brownsville—was constructed through a syndicate composed of 99 subscribers. It is now earning $5,476 per mile gross, practically upon its local business. Had it not been for the revolution in Mexico, which broke out in 1910, the interchange business with the National Lines of Mexico would have placed the Brownsville Line two years ago upon a paying basis.

I visited Mexico City and conferred with Mr. Limantour, then minister of finance, and Mr. Brown, president of the National Lines of Mexico, and we reached an understanding for interchange of business through the Brownsville-Matamoros gateway.

An international bridge was constructed over the Rio Grande River, which is owned jointly by the Frisco and the National Lines of Mexico. When the bridge was first opened, there was a good interchange of business between the two lines, which would have soon reached 75 to 100 cars a day. There is a profitable business awaiting a settlement of the revolution in Mexico for the New Orleans-Brownsville Line, and I am confident that 25 per cent, if not one-third, of the interchange traffic between this country and Mexico can be controlled through the Brownsville-Matamoros gateway.

But for the disastrous floods of 1911 and 1912, the New Orleans and Brownsville Lines would have shown satisfactory results. War in Mexico cut into another large source of traffic, which could have been handled without any material additional cost in operation.

The loss in traffic and property to the Frisco on account of these conditions amounted to several million dollars. The Gulf Coast Line could probably have stood floods and war one year, but with two successive years the result has been very unsatisfactory.

It is believed by an expert engineer who has recently made for certain bondholders an exhaustive study and report of the New Orleans, Texas & Mexico that the line will, within three years, show an earning capacity averaging $7,000 per mile gross per annum. It is also estimated that, being a low-grade road, it can be operated for 70 per cent of its gross earnings, resulting in a net of $2,100 per mile per annum.

This line covers the richest and most productive section in the entire Western Hemisphere, and while criticism has been made of its acquisition, I predict that if it is eliminated under the reorganization of the Frisco, its loss will be as much regretted as its ownership is now criticized.

The syndicate which constructed the Brownsville line had no agreement or understanding whatever that it would be sold to the Frisco. This was shown by Mr. A. T. Perkins, who was the representative of the syndicate and who gave a very clear account of its transactions at the Interstate Commerce Commission hearing in St. Louis. The syndicate which organized and projected this road—not the railroad company itself—received from large landholders donations of land, including town sites and much of the right of way of that railway, to induce them to undertake its construction. All the lands then needed by the railway for right of way, stations, and other purposes, or thought likely to be needed in the future, were conveyed to the railway company.

The Frisco paid in 1909 for the Brownsville line $11,827,200. The total valuation fixed by the railroad commission of Texas in 1909 on that line, including equipment and appurtenances, was $11,874,951.92, or an amount slightly in excess of the price paid by the Frisco.

Growth of Frisco since 1896.

	1897	1913	Increase.
			P. ct.
Frisco mileage	1,162	5,259	352
Frisco earnings per mile	$5,157	$8,763	70
Frisco gross earnings	$5,993,336	$46,050,000	668
Stock and bond capitalization per mile	$70,744	[1]52,655	[1]25.55

[1] December.

The Frisco's gross earnings per mile in 1897 were 7.29 per cent on its total capitalization per mile, and to-day its gross earnings are 16.64 per cent on its total capitalization per mile, or more than double what they were in 1897. Including the outstanding Kansas City, Fort Scott & Memphis certificates and equipment trust obligations, the total bond and stock capitalization to-day is $57,766 per mile.

The Frisco, at the time of its reorganization in 1896, was laid with 45 to 60 pound rail. All of its main line has been relaid with heavy rail, ballasted, and is in as good physical operating condition as the average railroad through the territory it traverses.

Special attention has been paid to the acquisition of terminals at the large commercial centers. No other railroad in that section has as adequate terminals or is as well provided for the future in that regard as the Frisco.

A fact which gives me pleasure is that on the railroads I have been instrumental in building, there are now something like 25,000 employees. This army of employees support and educate 100,000 people, and such employment is permanent, and will be there for those who operate these railroads for all time to come. These employees are loyal to the road, as they know during all the time of my activity I have stood for fair compensation, rules, and regulations toward the men who are engaged in the operation of the line.

PHYSICAL VALUATIONS BY UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT.

We are about to have physical valuation by the Government of railroad properties in this country, and I confidently believe that the assets of the Frisco will equal the par of all its outstanding bonds, other obligations, and stock. At any rate, the Frisco, on account of its superior terminal facilities and other points of advantage, together with its relatively small capitalization, will hold its own with any other railroad in this country.

I have endeavored to be a builder and to aid in the creation of wealth for the country into which the Frisco lines have been projected. On the line from Houston to Brownsville land values have increased from about $2 an acre in 1901 to from $25 to $150 per acre to-day, or probably $100,000,000 increase in value on the land within 10 miles on either side of the railroad along that 400 miles. The same can be said of Oklahoma, where we pushed railroads through when it was 15 to 20 miles between houses.

The Oklahoma lines of the Frisco serve the most populous section of the State and most productive in agriculture, oil, and coal. The 1900 census showed the State had a population of 790,000, while in 1910 it was 1,657,000, and it probably now is close to 2,000,000 people. This gives you an idea of what that country was when we entered it and what it is to-day, due largely to the activities of the Frisco lines.

The southwestern group of States served by the Frisco are rapidly becoming the greatest food-producing States of the Union, and will continue as their development is pushed forward to furnish their quota of all foodstuffs for the balance of the country. No one unfamiliar with that section of the country and the people who are pushing its growth so rapidly can appreciate what the last 10 years have done in its growth, development, and prosperity.

Since I have been connected with the management of these properties their gross earnings have reached the sum of $46,050,000 per annum, as shown below. During the period covered the mileage operated increased only 224 miles.

	Gross earnings.	Increase over previous year.
		Per cent.
1905	$29,958,000	11
1906	32,047,000	7
1907	38,621,000	20
1908	35,806,000	[1]7
1909	37,757,000	5½
1910	41,186,000	9
1911	43,159,000	5
1912	42,100,000	[2]2½
1913	46,050,000	9.4

[1] Decrease (following panic). [2] Decrease (heavy loss from floods).

The above shows an average increase of approximately 6 per cent annually during the last 9 years. If we figure an average annual increase of 5 per cent, the earnings in 5 years will be $57,562,000, and in 10 years $70,000,000. If the through line to Panama is opened within the next 5 years, the Frisco would be its logical connection, and the figures named would be largely exceeded.

We built the system in the only way it could be done at the time; otherwise there would have been no Frisco System as it stands to-day, the best of the Southwest. It constitutes my life's work, and it is my purpose to see it on its feet, its difficulties cleared away, and that the stockholders get their money out of the property if they stay with it. The property is worth every dollar against it in both stock and bonds under any fair valuation.

SALE OF SECURITIES.

Much comment has been made that the securities of the Frisco during a long period of years have been sold at less than their aggregate par value, by a sum in excess of $30,000,000. It is true that a comparatively new system doing the work of extension and development like the Frisco is not always as favorably situated in the money markets as are the larger and more powerful systems with well established traffic and serving a highly developed and populous section. Some of our strongest railroads, however, are now paying as dearly for money as the Frisco ever did.

Under the reorganization plan of 1896, the first and second preferred stocks were limited to 4 per cent, and as under the laws of Missouri railroad stock can not be sold for less than par, that plan practically prevented further sale of preferred stock. This perhaps could not be foreseen at the time of the reorganization, and I only refer to it as one of the difficulties encountered in financing the Frisco System. Therefore the only source of financing was through bond issues.

Grouping the three largest bond issues, and taking the net amount of money received, the Frisco paid a total discount including commissions of about $32,000,000. (I have not the exact data at hand.) No one received any part of these discounts and commissions except the bankers and investors themselves. This discount, however, is not a direct outlay of money but is an obligation whose maturity is spread over 15 to 50 years. In other words, its effect is to raise the apparent average rate of interest from, say, 5 per cent on par to an actual rate of from 7 to 7½ per cent. This computation of rate of interest includes final payment of the bonds in full.

MY STOCK OWNERSHIP IN THE FRISCO.

I am one of the largest holders of St. Louis & San Francisco stock. My holdings are as large now as they have ever been. If to my own is added the stock held by my family, our holdings are probably the largest in the company. I have never lost faith in the property, and I have confidence in its future outcome, notwithstanding its temporary troubles.

In conclusion, let me say that criticism of me is more or less natural, following the receivership, and considering my close connection with the company. That it has been severe to the point of injustice I have tried to make clear to you in this communication. What profits I have received from these undertakings represent at most only a liberal interest on investments, as shown above. My principal motive was not that of selfish personal gain, but the building of the railroad system and the growth of the country in which it lies. The construction of new railroads through sparsely settled western sections does not appeal to bankers as investments, and therefore syndicate financing in accord with existing custom was employed. No one will deny the great changes that have taken place in public opinion during the past 10 years. I recognize the public disapproval of dealings between a corporation and its officials. While I believe it ought not to apply to pioneering enterprises, which have in the past depended for their success upon syndicate or individual financing, on the whole I am convinced that the policy is right.

It is equally true that within the same period many other familiar corporate acts, such as contributions to political campaigns, rebating, trade and traffic agreements, have come under the ban of public opinion. It is my earnest wish to cooperate in the work of reconstruction with all the resources of strength and money within my power. I shall devote myself to this work, and in conjunction with many able men who are also giving their time and energies to its success, will do all I can to rehabilitate the Frisco System and to so reorganize it that the stockholders may be fully protected and their losses regained. Nothing less than this will satisfy me or do justice to this great property.

Respectfully,

B. F. YOAKUM.

Mr. OWEN. The above letter, I am informed, was prepared by Mr. Yoakum for his stockholders, assisted by his counsel—among others, by Mr. Sam Priest, of St. Louis—and answers the questions raised as to Mr. Yoakum's participation in various construction companies who built sections of railway for the Frisco.

FEBRUARY 10, 1916.

Hon. EDGAR E. CLARK,
Interstate Commerce Commissioner, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of a letter from B. F. Yoakum, Esq., who built a little over 1,400 miles of railroad for the Frisco System through Oklahoma.

Mr. Yoakum has been bitterly assailed in the public press as though he were a common criminal. I have looked through your report and I did not see anything in it that would justify any such inference.

In the case of the North American Co., complainant, against the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Co., defendant, a report was made to Hon. Walter H. Sanborn, circuit judge of the eighth judicial district, sitting in the United States District Court of the Eastern District of Missouri.

On the 26th of December, 1913, the court entered an order instructing John D. Johnson and Loomis C. Johnson to act as special counsel for the receivers and to institute a thorough inquiry into the question as to whether or not any of the directors of the Frisco had been guilty of such conduct as would justify a suit or suits against them. They made their report subsequent to the report which you had made and in the light of the information which you had gathered, and concluded their report with the following paragraph:

"We have failed to find, however—and, judging by the information that we have, we do not believe—that any of the directors of the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Co. have been guilty of any actual, willful, or intentional fraud in the administration of the affairs of the government."

They state also:

"We desire to say that we have made a thorough investigation of the matters intrusted to us."

This was an official report to Judge Sanborn, which was filed with the court as a part of the proceedings.

I desire to know if, from your examination, you concur in the concluding paragraph above quoted from the report made to Judge Sanborn, with regard to the conduct of the directors of the Frisco, and especially as to Mr. Yoakum.

I shall appreciate your very early reply. All I want is your personal opinion in regard to this matter.

Yours, very respectfully, ROBERT L. OWEN.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, February 11, 1916.

Hon. ROBERT L. OWEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter of the 10th, in which you ask if I concur in the following statement:

"We have failed to find, however, and judging by the information that we have, we do not believe that any of the directors of the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Co. have been guilty of any actual, willful, or intentional fraud in the administration of the affairs of the government."

Which you say was contained in a report made to Circuit Judge Sanborn, of the eighth judicial district, by counsel appointed by the court to act for the receivers in instituting a thorough inquiry into the question of whether or not any of the directors of the Frisco had been guilty of conduct which would justify suit or suits against them.

It appears that this report to the court was made subsequent to the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission to the Senate on its investigation responsive to the Senate resolution.

I heard all the testimony in the commission's investigation and studied the record with care. I felt that in connection with the affairs of the Frisco and its leased lines and subsidiaries there had been some rather reckless financing. The credit of the Frisco was strained to the breaking point by loaning its credit to the subsidiary lines which had been constructed. I think that if the Frisco had had the money or the credit with which to tide over the troubles in Mexico, which seriously affected some of the subsidiary lines, and also the period following construction of new line, within which it must develop a paying business, the project as contemplated would have been a great success. I base this opinion in part upon what I understand to have been the development in the territory served by some of these subsidiary lines since the receivership and under the unfavorable conditions that have existed.

In addition, it should be noted that the strain on the credit of the Frisco was intensified by the fact that its pressing needs had resulted in its paying a total of something more than $29,000,000 in discounts and commissions on the securities which it had issued and which had been sold to or through investment bankers. It therefore was undertaking to pay interest on $29,000,000 more than it had received for these securities.

As our report to the Senate shows, Mr. Yoakum was really the moving spirit in promoting and arranging for the construction of these subsidiary lines, and he was to a certain extent an important figure in the construction companies and syndicates which were organized and formed for the purpose of acquiring rights of way and constructing the roads which later passed into the control of the Frisco. Some profits accrued from these undertakings, but I did not gain the belief or impression that Mr. Yoakum at any time was guilty of or intended to be guilty of any "actual, willful, or intentional fraud in the administration of the affairs of the Frisco."

I assume that the concluding word of this quotation should be "Frisco" instead of "government."

Yours, truly, E. E. CLARK.

REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent to take up the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 98) to print as a public document the final report and testimony submitted to Congress by the United States Commission on Industrial Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator whether that is likely to take much time?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think not.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am going out of town immediately, and the joint resolution which I was pressing to a vote yesterday has now been amended, and I think it can be disposed of without any further debate. I will ask the Senator if he will not give way for that?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think this joint resolution will scarcely take a minute of time. The report of the committee is unanimous and there is a pressing demand for the report. We are all getting letters every day calling for copies, and it ought to be disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I move to take up Senate joint resolution No. 60, which was under consideration yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a joint resolution which will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 60) creating a joint subcommittee from the membership of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to investigate the conditions relating to interstate and foreign commerce, and the necessity of further legislation relating thereto, and defining the powers and duties of such subcommittee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I suppose the motion is not subject to discussion as to whether it shall be taken up at this time, but I wish to ask the Senator why we can not go to the calendar again? It has been a good many days since we considered any of the unobjected bills upon the calendar. We have grown into the habit lately of putting bills through by asking unanimous consent when they are reported. That leaves those who are unlucky enough to have a bill reported and put on the calendar in a rather precarious position, because it seems as though we are never going to get to the calendar. Why should the Senator from Nevada ask to have one particular bill taken out of the calendar and considered when we have now nearly two hours that we can give to the unobjected bills, and undoubtedly his joint resolution would be reached before we are through?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that the reason why I ask for it is as a matter of courtesy to myself. I am obliged to go out of town this afternoon to meet an engagement to deliver an address before the Chamber of Commerce of New Haven tomorrow night. We have had under consideration for a number of days Senate joint resolution No. 60, and the debate is finished upon it, I understand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment. There is a plain rule of the Senate that all motions made before 2 o'clock to proceed to the consideration of any matter shall be determined without debate. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let us have the joint resolution read.

Mr. FLETCHER. Do I understand there was objection to taking up Senate joint resolution 98?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There was objection, and the Senator from Nevada has made a motion to proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 60, and it is not subject to debate before 2 o'clock. The question is on agreeing to the motion. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask for a division.

Mr. GALLINGER. We had better have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I notice that my pair, the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], is absent. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. STONE I notice that my pair, the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK], is not present. I transfer the pair to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE] and vote "yea."

Mr. BRYAN. I will inquire of the Chair has the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. BRYAN. I have a pair with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. He is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I am not aware how the Senator from New York would vote if present.

Mr. REED. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "yea."

Mr. LIPPITT. On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. In his absence I will refrain from voting.

Mr. HARDING (after having voted in the negative). In view of the absence of my general pair, the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], I desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (after having voted in the negative). I have voted, but I now notice that the Senator from New York

[Mr. O'GORMAN], with whom I am paired, has not voted. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. STONE. I announce the absence of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] on account of official business, and ask that the announcement stand for the day.

Mr. OWEN (after having voted in the affirmative). I wish to transfer my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I beg to state that I have been requested to announce the pair existing between the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to announce that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] are engaged in a hearing of the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee, and that, therefore, they are necessarily absent.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED];

The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]; and

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

The result was announced—yeas 45, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—45.

Ashurst	James	Phelan	Sterling
Bankhead	Johnson, Me.	Pittman	Stone
Beckham	Johnson, S. Dak.	Poindexter	Swanson

So Mr. NEWLANDS's motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 60) creating a joint subcommittee from the membership of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to investigate the conditions relating to interstate and foreign commerce, and the necessity of further legislation relating thereto, and defining the powers and duties of such subcommittee.

The SECRETARY. The committee amendments to the joint resolution have been in part agreed to and in part disagreed to; and the joint resolution has been further amended on the motion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I submit the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 2. That the experts, special agents, and clerks employed under this appropriation shall be selected from persons eligible on any civil-service register.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, would it be agreeable to the Senator from New Hampshire to add to the section which he has proposed the words "as far as practicable"? The Senator will readily understand that possibly it may be impossible to get some of these experts from the civil-service list.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, there seems to be such an utter disregard of the civil-service law at the present time that I should very much like to have it enforced on this bill. I noticed on yesterday that the President disregarded the civil-service law and placed six persons in one bunch in the classified service of the Government without examination. That practice is going on day by day. Not only that, but every bill we pass creating a great force of clerks, stenographers, and special agents ignores the civil-service law, and the appointments are made on purely political grounds.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not understand the reference the Senator made to the order of the President. Will he repeat that?

Mr. GALLINGER. I said the President on yesterday, or the day before, placed six persons in the service of the Government without any reference to the civil-service law.

Mr. NORRIS. And those persons would have been under the civil service had it not been for the President's order?

Mr. GALLINGER. Precisely; or they would not have got into the service at all. The presumption is that they could not have passed the civil-service examination. I do not know how that is; but I will say that I would very much like to see a better observance of the civil-service law than we are having at the present time.

I feel that we are making a mistake in passing bills that provide for a great force of experts, stenographers, and clerks without providing that they shall be appointed from the civil-service register. We passed three or four such bills at the last session—among them the Federal Trade Commission bill and the Clayton bill—allowing these employees to be selected without any reference to the civil service. I do not know but the suggestion of the Senator from Nevada may be a wise one. If I had any assurance that the appointments would be made in good faith, and that some positions could not be filled from the civil-service lists, the suggestion of the Senator from Nevada would be entitled to serious consideration; but I have an impression that all such employees can be obtained from the civil-service register.

Mr. President, one of the greatest hardships that is being committed upon the young men and women of this country at the present time is that they are called from their homes to go to the capitals of the different States and to other places to take civil-service examinations. It costs them individually $10 or $15 to do that. They take the examination; they are notified that they passed; their names are sent to the Civil Service Commission; they go on the register, but they are seldom ever certified; and ignoring them, we go on appointing hundreds and hundreds of people who have never taken the civil-service examinations to positions which these young men and women could fill, and to which they are fairly entitled. It is a cruel hardship, and causes the expenditure of money on the part of young men and women which they can ill afford. What I should like to see is an honest administration of the civil-service law of the country or a repeal of the law, which at the present time is a farce as it is being administered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I sincerely hope the Senator from Nevada will accept the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire. I do not believe Senators are aware of the number of orders issued by the Executive placing persons in the civil service who are incapable of passing the required examination. I have been collecting these orders for the last two weeks and already I have over a hundred of them. I want to call the attention of the Senate to one order as an example. Congress made an appropriation of $450,000 for the expenses of the Commission on Industrial Relations, created to investigate certain conditions affecting labor in the United States. No provision was made in the law that the employees should be selected from the civil service. The commission selected its help. It spent the $450,000. Its report is to be printed at an expense of $92,000 as a beginning, and the life of the commission has ceased but a very few days; it ceased after an Executive order was issued covering every employee of the commission into the civil service. That is only one case.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not one of whom had passed the examination.

Mr. STONE. You covered a great many more postmasters into the civil service just before the last administration went out of office.

Mr. SMOOT. And nearly everyone of them is out of the service to-day. That has been reached by an examination so cleverly arranged that the covering of fourth-class postmasters into the civil service did the then occupants of the office little good.

Mr. STONE. And so would all these people go out if the country should suffer the misfortune of having your party get into power.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what the Senator says. So far as the Senator from Utah is concerned, I want to say that he has been always in favor of the employees of the Government of the United States passing the required civil-service examination as long as we have such a service.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Utah a question. I should like to know if he can point to any precedent for requiring a committee of Congress to get from the civil-service roll the assistants it may need in the investigations it is required to make?

Mr. SMOOT. I can not say offhand; but I will say to the Senator——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am sure, I will say to the Senator, that no such precedent can be found; and I can hardly feel that we would be justified in trammeling the hands of a committee of Congress by requiring it to go to the Civil Service Commission to get such assistants as the committee might need.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that this joint resolution, if passed, is unlimited as to the amount of money that may be expended under it. No one can tell the extent of the investigation; no one can tell what the expense to the Government will be. Generally, when we pass a resolution of this character, there is a limit to the expenditure, but there is none in the case of this joint resolution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should like to suggest that there was a limit put in the joint resolution when it originally came before this body, but I think the limit was stricken out yesterday because of a desire to kill the joint resolution. I observed that those who voted to remove the limit were those who were opposed to the joint resolution. Now, that question could be reconsidered here and the limit could be put back, and those who favor the joint resolution now would be very glad to have it put back.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; I will state that there was a limit in the joint resolution of $25,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is out now.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would have been very glad to have retained it. It was taken out against my protest.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Idaho, in all conscience and in all sincerity, if he thinks that, with the amendment which he caused to have inserted in the joint resolution, $25,000 would be a tenth part of the amount that would be required to conduct this investigation?

Mr. BORAH. I take it, then, that the Senator is opposed to the limit, because he is interested in the amendment which I introduced to the joint resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no. I think it is a farce to authorize an appropriation of $25,000 to conduct the investigation, and then include in the joint resolution the various matters which have been included on motion of the Senator from Idaho, which, in my judgment, will necessitate an expenditure of ten times that amount. That is my view. With the amendment of the Senator from Idaho attached, the investigation will be so comprehensive that it will probably take 10 years to make it, and it will take a vast amount of money to pay the bills.

Mr. BORAH. I feel more interest in my amendment to-day than I did yesterday, if that be true, because if it is a matter of that great concern, we can not start on the investigation too soon, and any money which we expend in that way will be profitably spent. A question so large, so momentous in every way, deserves long and serious investigation, and if the money is intelligently spent for such an investigation it is well spent.

Now, Mr. President, may I say, while I am on my feet, that I have not had a very profound regard for the civil-service law at any time. I believe in the principle, but it seems almost impossible of faithful application. It is generally effectual for getting those out that you want out and getting those in that you want in. It has worked in that way under all parties, and it looks as if it will continue to work that way so long as strict party politics obtain in the United States. But, Mr. President, you could not find in the civil service the number of experts and others whom you want to do the work required. I think the suggestion made by the Senator from Nevada is a very fair one, and that is that we only go to the civil service for those whom we can really find there, or in so far as it is practicable. We ought not to attempt again to emasculate the resolution or to destroy it by putting that into it which is impossible of execution. There will be some experts required you will not be able to secure through the civil service. I think the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire should be amended in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Nevada. If so amended, I would support it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, what I rose for was to discuss the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

I want to say to the Senate that I have not the least doubt that if the joint resolution passes without the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire every employee of the subcommittee will be transferred to the civil service bodily within a few days after the investigation ceases. That has been the practice; I think it will be practice; and I do not believe it is a proper course to follow.

If we are going to have a civil service, let us have it. If it is not a good thing, let us abolish it entirely.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, if we are going to have the employees of committees of Congress selected under the civil service, why not select our clerks under the civil service? Why not select our secretaries under the civil service?

Mr. SMOOT. That is entirely a different proposition, Mr. President.

Mr. OVERMAN. Not at all.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from North Carolina certainly would not want to have for his private clerk a man selected from any part of the United States, who knows nothing about his State or about his people or about the conditions in his State. That is entirely a different proposition.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know that if I were on a committee I would not want to apply to the Civil Service Commission for a man to do the clerical work of the committee. I have known men certified and employed who were thoroughly incompetent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator refer to civil-service employees?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes, sir; civil-service employees.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course if the argument of the Senator is to be taken into consideration, we had better abolish the civil service entirely. That is the only answer I can make to that. But if there are cases such as the Senator has just cited—and I do not doubt that there are—they are so few and so rare, in the selection of men that have passed the civil-service requirements, that I think it is hardly worth while to consider them when we are considering the question broadly, as I think Congress ought to do.

I do not wish to take any more of the time of the Senate, but I do hope the Senator from Nevada will accept the amendment as offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I can not accept this amendment. No precedent can be found for the selection of employees of any committee or subcommittee of either House of Congress from the civil-service list.

With reference to the civil-service law, I believe in its enforcement. I believe that the President is enforcing that law, and that in taking the action to which reference is made he has been simply availing himself in a wise way of certain relaxations of the enforcement of the law provided by the law itself.

So far as the appropriation is concerned, I wish to say that the committee reported an amendment allowing $25,000 for the expenses of experts and other employees of the subcommittee, and I am perfectly willing that that provision should be restored. It was stricken out, as the Senator from Idaho says, by those who, I think, are opposed to the resolution. I should be glad to see it inserted again, though, of course, the inquiry presented by the amendment of the Senator from Idaho may occasion a greater expense. In that case, however, I will simply come back to Congress for a larger appropriation, so that Congress can have an opportunity of acting upon it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in response to the suggestion of the Senator from Nevada that the words "as far as practicable" should be inserted in the amendment, I agree to it, and the amendment will be modified to that extent.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Upon reflection, Mr. President, I prefer not to see the amendment offered by the Senator adopted in any form.

Mr. GALLINGER. I expected that that was what the Senator would say, and that is one reason why I agreed to his suggestion. I was satisfied that since he made the suggestion he had been converted to the idea that the spoils system ought to prevail while his party is in power.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that the reasons presented by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] on the floor in the discussion of the matter convinced me that even the amendment as subsequently modified by the Senator would not be proper.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for a vote on the amendment which I have submitted.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that he ought not to include stenographers in that provision. It would be almost impossible to find upon any eligible list stenographers who can report testimony to the satisfaction of the committee, for the very good reason that stenographers of that ability have plenty of work without taking the civil-service examination. I think the Senator ought to strike out those words.

Mr. GALLINGER. And yet, Mr. President, I would suggest to the Senator that as I understand the matter there is an eligible list containing stenographers, young men and young women, who have paid their money to take these examinations. They have been favorably passed upon, and the Civil Service Commission has placed their names on the eligible list. If they remain there for a year they are stricken off, and they have to take another examination. I think they ought to have a chance to get some employment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The difficulty is, Mr. President, that while the stenographers who are upon the eligible list are quite capable of going into an office and taking dictation and writing letters and doing departmental work, the Senator would not, for example, be willing to take a stenographer from the civil-service eligible list to serve in this body, to report the proceedings. Men who are thus qualified do not seek civil-service appointments. That is the real fact about the matter.

I am in hearty accord with the Senator's proposition, and I intend to vote for it; but I think he ought to strike out the word "stenographers."

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I ask to modify the amendment by striking out the word "stenographers."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, as modified.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRYAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], who is absent from the Senate. For that reason I withhold my vote. If privileged to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. HARDING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. He is not present, and I will withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey (when Mr. O'GORMAN's name was called). I beg to state regarding the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] that he is absent and paired with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I again announce my general pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BANKHEAD (when Mr. UNDERWOOD's name was called). My colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is temporarily absent from the Senate. He is paired with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. If my colleague were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to transfer my pair heretofore announced to the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], and vote "yea."

Mr. HOLLIS. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and will vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 40, as follows:

So Mr. GALLINGER's amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I move to amend the joint resolution by striking out in line 19, at the end of the line, the words "a sum sufficient" and inserting in lieu thereof "the sum of $24,000, or so much thereof as is necessary."

Mr. NEWLANDS. I accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate has a right to vote on that matter. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, for the purpose of demonstrating that the amount placed in the joint resolution will be totally inadequate, I ask that the joint resolution may be read as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution as amended.

The joint resolution as amended was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate and the Committee of the House of Representatives on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, through a joint subcommittee to consist of five Senators and five Representatives, who shall be selected by said committees, respectively, be, and they hereby are, appointed to investigate the subject of the Government control and regulation of interstate and foreign transportation, the efficiency of the existing system in protecting the rights of shippers and carriers and in promoting the public interest, the incorporation or control of the incorporation of carriers, and all proposed changes in the organization of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the act to regulate commerce; also the subject of Government ownership of all public utilities, such as telegraph, telephone, express companies, and railroads engaged in interstate and foreign commerce and report as to the wisdom or feasibility of Government ownership of such utilities and as to the comparative worth and efficiency of Government regulation and control as compared with Government ownership and operation, with authority to sit during the recess of Congress and with power to summon witnesses, to appoint necessary experts, clerks, and stenographers, and to do whatever is necessary for a full and comprehensive examination and study of the subject and report to Congress as expeditiously as may be; that the sum of $24,000, or so much thereof as is necessary to carry out the purposes of this resolution and to pay the necessary expenses of the subcommittee and its members, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. Said appropriation shall be immediately available and shall be paid out on the audit and order of the chairman or acting chairman of said subcommittee, which audit and order shall be conclusive and binding upon all departments as to the correctness of the accounts of such subcommittee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the joint resolution be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am not going to take more than a minute of time. I do not care to delay action on the joint resolution.

The other day when this joint resolution was up for consideration I took some considerable time of the Senate in discussing the resolution, calling attention to the fact that I believed the resolution was simply offered here and was to be passed to be used as an excuse in the coming political campaign for the Democratic Party to give to the people as a reason why they had not complied with that part of the Baltimore platform in which they pledged themselves to pass a law that would give to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to control the issuing of the stocks and bonds of interstate railroads. I do not believe it has any other object. I believe that nothing would be accomplished except to use this resolution as a peg on which to hang that kind of an excuse, although the Senator from Nevada in presenting the resolution gave as one of the reasons for its presentation that a campaign was coming on and he thought we could discuss legislation on the subject much better if there was not any campaign coming on.

I notice in the joint resolution itself that it refers to interstate and foreign commerce. I presume that it will not be many days before we will be called upon to consider a shipping bill that will be brought in here as a part of the legislative program. The very terms of this resolution, if it is in earnest and in good faith and is what it says, would apply to the shipping bill, being interstate commerce, just as much as it would apply to the railroads; and if because there is a campaign coming on we want to avoid the discussion of anything that might get into politics, then that shipping bill ought to go over. There is scarcely a bill which will come before the Senate that the same excuse can not be given for its postponement and a joint committee created to investigate and expend some money.

But, Mr. President, since I made those remarks here, over the objection and the protest of the father of the resolution, the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] was adopted. In my judgment that has placed something in the resolution that gives it some meat, not because there would not be meat in the investigation of the railroad situation generally but because that is a part of the proposed investigation that has not been investigated. As I tried to show the other day, we have had investigations galore, and volumes and volumes have been printed as far as the railroad part of it is concerned, and officials that we have created by law, the Interstate Commerce Commission, have time and time again asked for some legislation that was pledged by the Baltimore platform. We are not going to get it, but we are going to investigate further.

However, since the adoption of the suggested amendment of the Senator from Idaho and for the reasons that he so well stated in his argument yesterday, if the committee in good faith will go into the question they will find a great deal to investigate so that they will not be under the necessity of amusing themselves by simply putting in time and investigating something that has been already investigated.

For that reason I do not feel the same opposition to the joint resolution that I felt the other day, and I have no objection to its passage.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I would have gladly voted for the joint resolution as reported from the committee to the Senate, but in the form that it is now before the Senate I can not vote for it. I believe there is not a Senator here who does not know that if the investigations of the subject mentioned in the joint resolution are made it will cost the Government $500,000 at least. If an investigation is made merely upon rumors or a few interested persons, it will amount to nothing; but if we are going into the investigation of the question it ought to be investigated properly and any report that is made to the Congress of the United States and the people ought to be a thorough one, or none at all. It seems to me it is perfectly absurd on its face to think that we can get information on the subjects of the joint resolution by the expenditure of $24,000.

I simply say this, Mr. President, because I want it known that in voting against the joint resolution I vote against it not because I care for the investigation of the railroads as the original joint resolution calls for. They have been investigated and investigated, and we have spent thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars, and I do not care how much more they are investigated, nor do I think the railroads care. In fact, I rather think the railroads would like to have the investigation made; but if we are going into the investigation of telephone and telegraph companies, how they are operated in foreign countries, and how they are operated in the United States, and whether the rates or charges are fair can not be ascertained unless we know the cost of construction of all the telephone lines of the country and compare the same with the telephone cost in foreign countries and cost of operation of the same. Unless we have complete information, it will be perfectly useless to Congress.

Therefore, Mr. President, I shall vote against the joint resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before the Senator takes his seat I will ask the Senator if he can state with any degree of definiteness what amount of money was expended on the late Industrial Commission?

Mr. SMOOT. There was $450,000 originally appropriated. That was all spent, and now we are to expend $92,000 more for the printing of the report. Originally the joint resolution providing the appropriation included the printing of the report. I am sorry to say that the commission had the report printed at Chicago at a private printing shop, and now it will be necessary to set it up again at the Government Printing Office at an expense—I can not say exactly how much—whereas if the commission created by Congress to collect information for Congress had had the Government Printing Office set up the type in the first place all that expense would have been avoided.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I will ask the Senator why the law did not provide that that should be done?

Mr. SMOOT. I did not say that the law provided for it. I said——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Whose fault was it that it did not provide that it should be done in that way?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think it was anyone's fault. I think Congress thought if it appropriated money for the gathering of certain information by the commission——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What commission?

Mr. SMOOT. The Industrial Commission.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then we ought not to print it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that we will print it. I think myself, and I will state to the Senator from Mississippi I believe Congress thought that if it gave the commission $450,000 with instructions that the report should be printed and paid for out of the appropriation, it had a perfect right to think that it would be printed at the Government Printing Office, an establishment of the Government.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, the expense of that commission, including the $92,000 for printing, the resolution having been agreed to, I understand, by the committee, and I do not know but that it has been reported to the Senate——

Mr. SMOOT. It is on the calendar now, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. That makes $540,000 odd; and now I will ask the Senator, who is a much better mathematician and business man than I am, if after listening to the reading of the joint resolution upon which we are about to vote he does not believe that if that investigation is conducted in good faith it will cost at least as much as the investigation conducted by the so-called Industrial Commission?

Mr. SMOOT. I stated, Mr. President, and I think I was moderate in my statement when I said that if this investigation proceeds under the joint resolution, and if information is collected which will be of any service whatever to the people of the United States and to Congress the amount expended must of necessity be a half million dollars.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator a question. I think the Senator is of the opinion that if we should ever adopt public ownership in this country in the way of ownership of telephones and telegraphs and railroads it would be, as some one has lately said, an economic calamity.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator frankly that I do not believe it would be a proper thing for the Government of the United States to embark on.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator realizes, however, that it is a thing which a great many people are urging in this country. Ought we not to be prepared on such a question unwise action upon which would be so disastrous?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah agrees with the Senator also. In the statement that I made I wanted to call attention to the fact that if the information is to be collected it ought to be collected properly and right and in such a way that it would be real information. I am quite sure the Senator from Idaho will admit that with $24,000 no information of any real benefit can be collected.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I think I will admit that; but the Senator from Utah and the Senator from New Hampshire are quite familiar with the fact that there are other ways of getting sufficient money to carry on an investigation aside from the original appropriation.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah is too well aware of that. I think the Treasurer of the United States at least has had a wonderful experience along that line.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the Senator from Utah and the Senator from New Hampshire are now interested in a thorough investigation.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I did not say that. I said if an investigation is to be made it ought to be a thorough investigation; or, in other words, I do not want to throw $24,000 away, and it seems to me that with the joint resolution as it is to-day it simply means that there is a waste of $24,000.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with the proposition that it will take more than $24,000 to do the work, and I am not discouraged at all when I view the precedents as to our ability to get the amount which is necessary to make the investigation.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator from Idaho is perfectly right.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Idaho will also remember that we had a little fight over the Child Labor Bureau. I think he said it would cost $25,000 a year, and now it is costing the sum of $250,000 to $300,000, and provision is made, as the Senator indicated, in another bill.

Mr. BORAH. I would like to add that the Senator from Idaho did not say it would cost only $25,000 a year. The Senator from Idaho said what he is now saying, that it was sufficient to start the cause, and, let me furthermore say, if $250,000 is being properly expended in behalf of the children of this country who are found in the places and conditions and environments in which they are found in so many instances, it is the best $250,000 that this Nation is spending. It is the one $250,000 which is anointed with a truly noble purpose and a truly necessary purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator that I agree with him in part, but I also want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the very work which is being done by the Child Labor Bureau is also being done by two other departments of our Government. Appropriations are made for duplicate work. We have had before the Committee on Appropriations representatives from those departments and they have called attention to the estimates and purposes of the appropriations asked for, and there has been no difference in the estimates or purposes for which the money was asked.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will ask the Senator if we did not compare the publications of one bureau with another and find that they are doing exactly the same work.

Mr. SMOOT. Exactly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then why does not the committee bring in a report striking out all the appropriations except that for the proper place?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that we did it on two occasions, I think; that is, we reduced the appropriation and the committee was voted down by the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I hope you will come back again and give us another chance.

Mr. SMOOT. As far as I am concerned, I will give the Senator a chance.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Striking out all the rest and leaving the best.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, our system is a system of duplication of work. We have three navies. We have at least four surveys being carried on. I once, some while ago, attempted to consolidate the surveys. It was quite hopeless. You employ more people with four surveys than with one, and you employ more people and have more officers with three navies than with one. If you have two sets of people collecting child-labor information, you employ double the number of expert people.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say that we recognize the fact that there is a duplication everywhere, and I believe we will save millions of dollars by a careful examination of this matter. On my motion I believe, or that of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], I have forgotten which, we agreed to employ experts who will report at the next meeting of the Committee on Appropriations showing where these duplications occur and where money can be saved.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], in his remarks on the cost of the report of the Industrial Commission, stated the figures accurately, I believe, but nevertheless his statement may lead to some misapprehension unless somewhat amplified.

Mr. SMOOT. I could not hear what the Senator said.

Mr. ASHURST. The remarks of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] as to the cost of printing the final report of the Industrial Commission might lead to a misapprehension unless amplified, althought the Senator did not misstate the figures. To print 100,000 copies of the final report of the Industrial Commission will cost $9,729.88, as indicated by the report of the committee. To print 10,000 copies of the testimony in 10 volumes would cost $54,978.84. Thus far the Committee on Printing has only authorized a resolution to print 100,000 copies of the final report——

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator is mistaken. I want to say to the Senator that every vote in the Committee on Printing was for the printing of 100,000 copies of the final report, 10,000 copies of the complete testimony, and 10,000 copies of the exhibits, except those in printed form. In other words, there have been about 30 books offered as testimony, and where those books are in print and can be referred to the committee did not think it was proper to put them in a printed form again, printing as public documents books that anyone can find at the Public Library.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, that is very gratifying information. I have had an estimate made as to the number of requests from citizens of the United States for this report, and I find that they will approximate over 100,000 in number.

To print the report and the testimony will cost $92,688.25, yet the Industrial Commission of 1901 spent $144,000 in printing.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true, Mr. President; and I want to say to the Senator from Arizona that the Government of the United States sold tons of those printed reports for 45 cents a hundred as old scrap paper.

I want to say further to the Senator that there is no objection upon my part to printing this report and to printing all that has been asked for here. I did not refer to it as a criticism; I referred to it as showing that though the amount appropriated in the pending resolution is only $24,000 to make an investigation that will be far more expensive than that investigation could possibly have been, we need not think for a moment that we are going to get off with an appropriation of $24,000 if an investigation which will amount to anything is to be made.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I wish to include in the RECORD figures to show that the testimony of the last Industrial Commission, while somewhat voluminous, was not so voluminous as some previous hearings on other important subjects. For instance, the Immigration Commission of 1909 printed 42 volumes, consisting in the total of 28,489 pages, and the Industrial Commission of 1901, whose report is composed of 19 volumes and 14,377 pages.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Can the Senator tell me how many of those were distributed and how many had to be sold for waste paper?

Mr. SMOOT. I can tell the Senator from Georgia that.

Mr. ASHURST. I will let the Senator from Utah, who tells us a great many things, answer the Senator from Georgia. Personally I do not know. The report of the Monetary Commission consisted of 47 volumes, comprising in the total 13,028 pages. The report and testimony of the Industrial Commission, which it is now proposed to print, will consist of 11 volumes and of only 10,320 pages. There is a widespread demand for the report of this Industrial Relations Commission.

Some persons may believe it to be extravagance to spend money to print this report, but I do not. One hundred thousand copies of the reports on the diseases of the horse and cow will cost approximately $68,000, but I do not believe it to be extravagance.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, right there I want to say to the Senator, in relation to his statement as to extravagance in the past, that the practice too long has existed that a Senator can rise in his seat and ask unanimous consent to have anything and everything printed and no objection made. I know of one instance when a Senator stood at this very desk and asked unanimous consent that a certain matter be printed as a public document which cost this Government nearly $100,000 and not a Senator objected, and not a Senator knew what the request would lead to.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I do not yield the floor, Mr. President. I for one have never been much in the habit of inveighing for political purposes against our opponents because of extravagance. The party in power will always be accused of extravagance by the party out of power and which is trying to "get in."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I want to say, in justification of the action of the minority members of the Committee on Printing, that we were in favor of printing everything that members of the commission asked for, and the resolution that has been reported comprises everything that that commission has asked for. We have had no disposition, as has been stated in certain quarters, of suppressing any part of this testimony. I have said that if the testimony or the report is extreme, partisan, and radical it will carry its own antidote when the people of the country examine it. I have been in favor of printing every word of the testimony that was given and also the printed. I say, in behalf of the minority members of the committee, that we all took that position. The truth is, we have final report, which, in my judgment, is not a very fair presentation of the case; but we have ordered it printed, and it will be always been extravagant in these matters, and I regret it.

As to the duplication of work, I will say only one word. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who is usually very accurate, said that we had four surveys doing practically the same work. We have five such surveys. The Senator from Massachusetts forgot one. Those surveys ought to be consolidated.

I voted against the bill establishing the Children's Bureau. I voted against it, and I stated at the time that I voted against it because that very work was then being done by one of the great departments of this Government and that until that department was asked to discontinue its work I thought it was extravagant to establish another bureau to do the same work. Of course I have been, as you can imagine, very seriously attacked because I voted against that bill. My vote against it became a part of the campaign against me last November. My opponents did not take the trouble to state why I voted against the bill. I have voted for every appropriation for the bureau since, but I thought it was unwise and a piece of unwarrantable extravagance to have one of the great departments of the Government doing the very work that this bureau was to do and duplicating it, as it did, at that time.

Mr. President, as to this appropriation of $24,000, it is a humbug to put it into the joint resolution, and it will not deceive many people. Nobody who is going to look into this matter at all will believe that any part of this investigation can be conducted at an expense of $24,000. If it is done thoroughly it will necessitate an examination of the telegraphic and telephonic systems of every country of the world; it will go into all matters connected with express companies; that is definitely stated. I say in all seriousness that if the investigation is made and made honestly, more than half a million dollars and perhaps a million dollars will be required to pay the bill. I can stand it if the party in power can stand it; but I have been solicitous, as a Republican, not to unnecessarily increase the deficit that we are now facing. I am prepared now and at all times to vote for reasonable economy in the expenditures of the Government. This is to be a very comprehensive investigation, and it will take months and, in my judgment, years to complete it if it is gone into in good faith.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I want to say a word in relation to the expenditures to be made under this joint resolution. I concede that if the Congress of the United States should authorize the appointment of a commission of independent men, with large salaries, a large amount of money would probably be expended before the final report was made; but this joint resolution provides that the proposed investigation shall be conducted by a committee of five Senators and five Representatives. Their time is already largely occupied, and they are not going to spend unnecessary time in such an investigation as is proposed; whereas a commission appointed from the outside would naturally spend a great deal of time, especially if they were drawing salaries. While the $24,000 may not be sufficient, I will be much surprised if the amount expended very much exceeds that sum.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, the appropriation of $24,000 will undoubtedly give employment to a few "deserving Democrats"; but it will not go beyond that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I hope we shall have a vote upon the joint resolution soon. On several occasions it has been on the very point of passing when the hour of 2 o'clock arrived, and it has been displaced by reason of the interposition of the unfinished business. I wish to say regarding the joint resolution——

Mr. GALLINGER. Let us have a vote.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, if we can have a vote without further debate, I have nothing more to say.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the joint resolution be engrossed for third reading?

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. SMOOT. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and vote "yea."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. I notice that he has not voted, and I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] and vote "yea."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "yea."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and vote "yea."

Mr. REED. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (after having voted in the negative). I have voted; but I have a general pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire whether the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have a pair with that Senator, and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. MYERS. I inquire if the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut, which I transfer to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. OWEN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and vote "yea."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I rise again to announce the pair existing between the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

I also desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] and his pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]; and

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

The result was announced—yeas 45, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—45.

So the joint resolution was passed.

The amendment striking out the preamble was agreed to.

MANUFACTURE OF ARMOR.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I ask that Senate bill 1417 may be laid before the Senate. I desire to submit some remarks upon it for about three minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator can discuss it, anyhow. It is not necessary to have it laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate Senate bill 1417, the title of which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1417) to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, is this a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I shall not object, as the hour is so late; but I desire to state to the Senate that to-morrow morning, during the morning hour, I shall press Order of Business No. 18, which is the first bill on the calendar that is to be pressed.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, before the Senate proceeds to the consideration of the bill just taken up, I want to call attention to an amendment which I propose to follow the last clause. In the hurry of preparation in the committee to report the bill last week it was omitted unintentionally. It is in the bill as introduced, and will be found in lines 6 and 7 on page 2. It is as follows: "Including all necessary drafting and clerical assistants." Then follows an amendment to the bill I introduced.

As soon as the Navy Department has decided whether it desires to include the making of munitions in this armor plant or not, I may introduce other amendments. The Secretary of the Navy has asked for authority to erect a munitions plant for the Navy, and it may be thought wise to incorporate the armor factory and the munitions plant under the same organization and put them in the same bill.

While we are not at war now—and God forbid that we be at war any time soon, if ever—wisdom points unerringly to the necessity of being ready to defend ourselves.

If President Wilson is quoted correctly as desiring the United States to have a navy "incomparably the greatest Navy in the world," I say now and here that I am not in favor of any such Navy as that; but I do want us to have the second greatest Navy afloat. I know that we can not rival England, because her very existence depends on her control of the sea. Her people would starve to death in six months if she could not get imports. By "the greatest Navy" I mean greatest in the efficiency of its officers and in the fighting qualities of its ships of all kinds. With the personnel, from the highest officer to the humblest Jacky in it, I am already well satisfied and believe they are second to none now—Germany's or Britain's—and the event will show it if we ever have a war with any great power. I can not believe that President Wilson spoke advisedly or in cold blood when he said that we should have "incomparably the greatest Navy in the world." I myself know, as a public speaker—and I have made as many or more stump speeches than any man in the Senate—the temptation to go a little further than prudence always warrants. Men become enthused and more or less rash; at least, they are more ultra than they otherwise would be when they get drunk on applause. We all know how that is, those of us who have been out on the hustings. When the people are shouting and hurrahing we go wild. [Laughter.]

I shall urge the Secretary to station the midshipmen authorized in the bill we passed last week on a schooling ship in the river if quarters can not be found on shore at Annapolis. With the number of cadets increased to three for each Congressman and Senator, we will soon have qualified naval officers enough, and there can be no complaint from the Navy Department itself of not having enough officers to man the ships, which is now the case.

GAME PRESERVE IN KANSAS.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to take up Order of Business 45, being the bill (S. 1793) granting to the State of Kansas title to certain lands in said State for use as a game preserve. It is a bill of local nature, which will not require any discussion. It simply authorizes the granting of certain lands to the State of Kansas for a game preserve near Garden City, Kans. This land was reserved for this express purpose. A proclamation was issued by the President October 14, 1915, abolishing the Kansas National Forest, which comprised 135,800 acres of land, commonly called "sand-hill" land, located along the southern bank of the Arkansas River, extending through the counties of Finney, Kearny, and Haskell. The forestry experiments were unsuccessful, and it was therefore thought best to abolish the national forest and to open up this land for settlement under the enlarged-homestead act. This was done December 1, 1915, except as to the five sections of land included in this bill, which were temporarily withdrawn for this proposed legislation to set such lands apart as a game refuge.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I did not hear what the Senator said. I could not hear a word he said.

Mr. THOMPSON. I simply asked to take up Order of Business 45 by unanimous consent. I spoke to the Senator from Utah concerning this bill, and he stated that he had no objection to its passage.

Mr. SMOOT. Granting to the State of Kansas certain lands?

Mr. THOMPSON. Granting to the State of Kansas title to five sections of land near Garden City for the purpose of a game preserve.

Mr. SMOOT. I remember the bill. I have no objection to its consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments, on line 4, after the word "Kansas" to insert "the public lands in"; on line 9, after the word "time," to insert "use or"; and, at the end of the bill, after "United States," on line 11, to insert "such reversion to be declared by the Secretary of the Interior," so as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to grant to the State of Kansas the public lands in sections 25, 26, and 35 in township 24 south and sections 1 and 2 in township 25 south, all in range 33 west, sixth principal meridian, for use as a game preserve: Provided, That if the said State shall at any time use or permit the said lands hereby granted to be used for any purpose not contemplated by this act the said lands shall revert to the United States, such reversion to be declared by the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. THOMPSON. I should like to have incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks in connection with this bill and showing the purpose of this legislation the report of the Secretary of Agriculture relative to it and also part of the proclamation of the President setting the land aside for this purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Extract from a letter of the Secretary of Agriculture, forming part of Report No. 62, 64th Cong., 1st sess.]

The bill provides for granting to the State of Kansas five sections of land for a game preserve in the northeastern corner of the Kansas National Forest, in Finney County near Garden City. On December 21, 1915, the Secretary of the Interior was advised that the lands within the Kansas National Forest were no longer needed for national forest purposes and was requested, after a conference between the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the forester, to have a proclamation drafted to open the area to entry, with the exception of certain sections which the State of Kansas had proposed to be set apart as a game preserve. These areas, as described in Senate bill 1793, are now withdrawn under the act of June 25, 1910, pending action by Congress.

The purpose of this game preserve is to provide permanently for the preservation of a small herd of antelope which has been protected for several years on the Kansas National Forest, and which is certain to become exterminated in the near future when the lands in the forest are opened to settlement unless provision is made for its protection. From every point of view the project seems to be desirable. The antelope, which is now in greater danger of extermination than any other species of big game native to the United States, is rapidly disappearing with the settlement of arid lands in the West, and it is very important that some provision be made for preserving this species. A small herd of antelope already exists on the Kansas National Forest, and if it can be rounded up and placed in an inclosure safe from coyotes and other predatory animals it can probably be preserved indefinitely.

A PROCLAMATION BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Whereas the public lands within the Kansas National Forest, in the State of Kansas, will not be required for experimental forest purposes after November 30, 1915; and

Whereas it appears that the public good will be promoted by abolishing said reservation thereafter, and by withdrawing the public lands in certain areas therein as hereinafter provided, and by restoring the remaining public lands in such reservation in a manner authorized by the act of Congress approved September 30, 1913, entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide a method for opening lands restored from reservation or withdrawal, and for other purposes:" Now, therefore,

I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, by virtue of the power in me vested by the act of Congress approved June 4, 1897 (30 Stat. 11, at 34 and 36), entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for other purposes," do proclaim that the Kansas National Forest, the boundaries of which are shown upon the diagram hereto annexed and forming a part hereof, shall be discontinued and cease to exist on December 1, 1915.

And I do also proclaim that, under authority of the act of Congress approved June 25, 1910 (36 Stat., 847), entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to make withdrawals of public lands in certain cases," as amended by the act approved August 24, 1912 (37 Stat., 497), the public lands in the following-described acreas are hereby temporarily withdrawn for classification and, pending consideration by Congress of proposed legislation to set such lands apart as a game refuge, such withdrawal to be effective on the termination of the national forest: In township 24 south, range 33 west, sections 25, 26, and 35; and in township 25 south, range 33 west, sections 1 and 2.

LAND IN PENSACOLA, FLA.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, there are two local bills on the calendar, Order of Business 68 and 69, which I should like to have considered at this time. I think there will be no objection to them. The Senate has passed the bills before, but it is important that action should be had now. They simply remove clouds from the title to some lots in Pensacola, Fla. There is no objection on the part of the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. These bills are exactly the same as the bills which passed the Senate at the last session?

Mr. FLETCHER. Exactly the same.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the first bill named by the Senator from Florida?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3580) releasing the claim of the United States Government to lot No. 306 in the old city of Pensacola, Fla. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent remissing, releasing, and quitclaiming forever all right, title, claim, and interest of the United States of America in and to lot No. 306 in the old city of Pensacola, in the county of Escambia and the State of Florida, to such person or persons, firms, or corporations as shall make proof that he himself, or he and his grantor or grantors, has had continuous possession thereof under claim of ownership during the last 20 years next before the passage of this act, and that such patent, however, shall be subject to any public easement or other adverse right suffered or granted by the patentee or his grantor.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the second bill named by the Senator from Florida?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3581) releasing the claim of the United States Government to that portion of land, being a fractional block, bounded on the north and east by Bayou Cadet, on the west by Cevallos Street, and on the south by Intendencia Street, in the old city of Pensacola, Fla.

It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent, remissing, releasing, and quitclaiming forever all right, title, claim, and interest of the United States of America in and to that portion of land, being a fractional block, bounded on the north and east by Bayou Cadet, on the west by Cevallos Street, and on the south by Intendencia Street, in the old city of Pensacola, in the county of Escambia and the State of Florida, to such person or persons, firms, or corporations as shall make proof that he himself, or he and his grantor or grantors, has had continuous possession thereof under claim of ownership during the last 20 years next before the passage of this act, and that such patent, however, shall be subject to any public easement or other adverse right suffered or granted by the patentee or his grantors.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent to that portion of land, being a fractional block, bounded on the north and east by Bayou Cadet, on the west by Cevallos Street, and on the south by Intendencia Street, in the old city of Pensacola, in the State of Florida."

LETITIA D. MAXHAM.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business No. 50. It is a resolution to pay a poor widow the usual sum upon the death of her husband.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being on objection, the resolution (S. Res. 6) was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate to Letitia D. Maxham, widow of Azro J. Maxham, late a folder of the United States Senate, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

LAND IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business No. 81. It is simply a bill for the purpose of perfecting a title to a lot in the District of Columbia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3509) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue a deed to the persons hereinafter named for part of a lot in the District of Columbia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to execute and deliver to Otto L. Wolfsteiner and Lillie M. Thomson, of the city of Washington, D. C., as tenants in common, a deed conveying to them in fee the following-described part of lot 39, of reservation 10, of the low grounds, District of Columbia, on the west side of Third Street, north of Pennsylvania Avenue, city of Washington: Beginning at the northwest corner of said lot 39; thence south on the west side of Third Street 25 feet to the south end of said lot; thence west 150 feet; thence north 25 feet; and thence east 150 feet to the place of beginning, and known as the eastern part of said lot 39, which lot, with others, was sold to Judge Buckner Thruston in 1822, under the provisions of the act of Congress of May 7, 1822 (3 Stats., 691), but no deed was ever made to him, or his successors in title, from these United States for such eastern part of said lot 39.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS IN DUCHESNE, UTAH.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business 77.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 36) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents for certain lands to the town of Duchesne, Utah.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents to the town of Duchesne, Utah, for the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter, section 2, township 4 south, range 5 west, Uinta special meridian, for cemetery purposes; and that if the town shall at any time permit the lands hereby granted to be used for any purpose not contemplated by this act the lands shall revert to the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. JONES. Order of Business 70 is a local bill, which has passed the Senate two or three times, and I should like to have it taken up for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3132) providing for the homestead entry of certain lands in the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment of the Committee on Public Lands was, in section 2, page 2, line 20, after the words "nineteen hundred and," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "ten"; and line 22, after the word "thereto," to insert "or any successor in occupation and interest of such settler," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That after said survey and the approval thereof by the Commissioner of the General Land Office the plat thereof shall be filed in the office of the register and receiver in the manner provided by law, and thereafter any settler who was in actual occupation of any portion of the lands described in section 1 hereof on the 1st day of January, 1910, who made actual settlement thereon in good faith for the purpose of securing a home, and who has since maintained his claim thereto, or any successor in occupation and interest of such settler, shall, if qualified to make a homestead entry, be entitled to make a homestead entry of the lands so occupied, not exceeding 20 acres in a body, according to the Government surveys and subdivisions thereof, upon payment to the Government at the time of such entry of the sum of $2.50 per acre for each acre entered by him, and within five years from the date of such entry he shall be required to submit proof showing residence and cultivation of such lands in the manner and for the length of time required by the homestead laws of the United States, and failure to make such showing shall be deemed sufficient cause for forfeiture of all rights to the land and to the money paid, and in case of any such default the land shall be offered at public sale.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RICHARD DAELEY.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business No. 67.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 809) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to accept the application for land entry of Richard Daeley.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, on page 1, line 10, after the word "Gallagher," to strike out "under soldier's additional homestead right, and to issue patent to said land upon receipt of proof that Richard Daeley has complied with the requirements of the land laws relative to entering land by additional soldier's scrip" and insert "and to issue patent thereon to said Richard Daeley upon proof of his compliance with the requirements of the law and regulations issued thereunder relative to making soldiers' additional homestead entries," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to accept the application of Richard Daeley to enter lot 8, section 31, township 147 north, of range 30 west of the fifth principal meridian, Cass Lake, Minn., land district, containing 1⅓ acres, more or less, according to the Government survey thereof, as assignee of Evaline Gallagher, wiodw of Edward S. Gallagher, and to issue patent thereon to said Richard Daeley upon proof of his compliance with the requirements of the law and regulations issued thereunder relative to making soldiers' additional homestead entries.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY E. NICOLSON.

Mr. BORAH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 922.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 922) for the relief of Mary E. Nicolson.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 6, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$900," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Mary E. Nicolson, of Idaho Falls, Idaho, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $900, to compensate for her the death of her son, C. Val Nicolson, killed while fighting fires on the Coeur d'Alene National Forest on August 20, 1910.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS L. GRIFFITHS.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask present consideration for Order of Business No. 41.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 6) authorizing issuance of patent for certain lands to Thomas L. Griffiths.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to issue to Thomas L. Griffiths a patent for lot 3 of section 30, in township 29 south, of range 8 west, of the Salt Lake meridian, in the State of Utah; and that he shall first have paid at the rate of $1.25 per acre therefor.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GRAVE OF SCARLET CROW.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business 130.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 584) to provide a headstone for the grave of Scarlet Crow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to erect a headstone to mark the grave of Scarlet Crow, a Sioux Indian chief of the Wahpeton Tribe, who was buried March 13, 1867, in the Congressional Cemetery, Washington, D. C., in a grave marked "76–R. A. 22," and for this purpose there is appropriated the sum of $100 out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETER M'KAY.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business No. 40. It is a bill which has previously passed the Senate several times.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1376) for the relief of Peter McKay.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$2,500," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Peter McKay, or his legal representatives, the sum of $2,500, as full compensation for permanent injuries received by the said McKay on the 5th day of May, 1904, at Fort Worden, in the State of Washington, by being struck with a large piece of log hurled by the explosion of an excessive blast of powder discharged without warning by employees of the United States Government engaged in clearing lands at said Fort Worden under the direction and control of the United States Government.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WARREN E. DAY.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business 129.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1048) for the relief of Warren E. Day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Warren E. Day, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,200, being for professional services rendered and medicine furnished the Hualapai Indians in Arizona Territory, under the orders and approval of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, during the years 1883 and 1884, and that the acceptance of this sum shall be considered as final settlement of all claims of every kind whatsoever against the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 3331.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. WALSH obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). The absence of a quorum is suggested, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	McLean	Sheppard
Bankhead	Harding	Martin, Va.	Sherman
Beckham	Hardwick	Martine, N. J.	Shields
Borah	Hollis	Myers	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	Hughes	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Broussard	Husting	Norris	Smoot
Catron	James	Overman	Sterling
Chamberlain	Johnson, Me.	Owen	Sutherland
Chilton	Johnson, S. Dak.	Page	Thompson
Clapp	Jones	Phelan	Tillman
Clarke, Ark.	Kenyon	Pittman	Vardaman
Cummins	La Follette	Poindexter	Walsh
du Pont	Lane	Pomerene	Warren
Fletcher	Lippitt	Ransdell	Williams
Gallinger	McCumber	Shafroth	Works

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Montana has the floor.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I have a number of amendments to propose to the bill at page 6, but as they are all more or less related to each other I shall offer instead an amendment which will be a substitute for page 6. I send it to the desk. I have several additional copies. I will be glad to send one to the Senator in charge of the bill and copies to any other Senators who may be interested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Amend by striking out all of page 6 of the bill and in lieu thereof insert the following:

ate to the benefit actually received by the grantee by reason of any increase of flow past or over the water-power structures artificially caused by such headwater improvement, and all moneys received from such charges and all other revenues accruing under this act are hereby reserved and appropriated as a special fund in the Treasury, to be known as the river improvement fund, from which fund expenditures for the improvement of rivers shall be made as Congress shall direct; (f) that such grantee in the construction, maintenance and operation of such dam or diversion structure and accessory works may, with the authority of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior, occupy and use, to the extent necessary for the project and for the period of his permit to maintain the dam to be constructed by him, any lands of the United States, including the public lands; and any part of the public lands may, on certification by the Secretary of War that the same is required for navigation purposes, be withdrawn by the President for said purpose as provided in the act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to make withdrawal of public lands in certain cases," approved June 25, 1910; and for any land of the United States so used and occupied and the other rights acquired hereunder when such lands are to be occupied, the grantee shall pay to the United States such reasonable annual charges as may be fixed by the said Secretary of War and the said Secretary of the Interior; and in fixing such charges consideration shall be taken of the benefits accruing from the use and occupation of such lands to the interests of navigation, as well as to the business of said grantee; (g) in cases in which no lands of the United States are to be occupied, that the grantee shall pay to the United States for the rights acquired hereunder such reasonable annual charges as may be fixed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, two clauses in the amendment provide that in the case of the occupation of any public land the consent and approval of the Secretary of the Interior shall be secured. If the amendment as a whole should not be adopted by the Senate I shall offer those as separate amendments later on.

In explanation of the amendment offered I will say to the Senate that by the bill as it appears at the bottom of page 5 and top of page 6 should any headwater improvements be made by the Government of the United States, and at its expense, the result of which would be of benefit to the power permittee, the bill provides that the Secretary of War may fix reasonable charges to be paid by the permittee for the use of such headwater improvements or for such benefits as may accrue to him by reason of the same. Those are all the charges that the permittee is required to pay. Any avails from that goes into a fund under the provisions of the bill as it stands called the headwater fund.

The amendment proposed by me contemplates that charges as a whole should be made. In other words, it presents the proposition that for the permission granted under the act the Secretary of War may in the lease or permit, as it may be designated, prescribe an annual charge to be paid by the permittee, and thus the amendment presents squarely the question as to whether any returns should be made to the Government for the privilege which the permittee acquires under the act.

Mr. President, I do not desire to say anything in connection with this matter further than to state my position with reference to it and the reasons which impelled me to the conclusion at which I have arrived.

Touching the question of the power of Congress to make a provision of this character in the act, which has been questioned in the course of this debate and in very many learned discussions which have taken place heretofore, I take this position: That Congress may grant the power to construct a dam across a navigable stream or withhold that power, I apprehend there is no room for dispute. Under the existing law any structure of that character in a navigable stream is a crime. It is an incumbrance and may be removed by the civil process of a court. That Congress has the power to grant this privilege or to withhold it, none, I undertake to say, will deny, and it seems to me to follow as of necessity and as an inevitable conclusion that if Congress can grant the power it may grant it upon just exactly such terms and conditions as it may see fit as between it and the permittee.

How, Mr. President, would the question ever be raised so as to be determined adversely to that contention? The permittee will be required to enter into contract with the Government of the United States, under the terms of which he agrees to pay to the United States, for the privilege he enjoys, so much. If he is sued for a failure to pay, he certainly can not contend that that is an unconstitutional agreement. He is certainly estopped from making any such contention as that when he has taken advantage of an act. I need not refer to the principles of estoppel which forbid him to do so.

So likewise, Mr. President, if under certain terms and conditions he goes on and constructs the dam and does not comply with any of those conditions—not being conditions of the act but conditions of his contract—he will be in no situation to prevent being ousted of his privileges upon the claim that no power of that kind exists.

Then, again, Mr. President, another provision of the bill is to the effect that if the Government of the United States should itself at any time undertake to develop a stream for purposes of navigation, and in the pursuit and conduct of that work should develop power, that power may be leased to anyone by the Government and the avails and rentals thus derived go into another fund, as is provided in section 10 of the act. The provision will be found on page 16 of the bill, as follows:

The charges and rents arising from such lease or leases are hereby reserved and appropriated as a special fund in the Treasury, to be expended for the maintenance of said dams and the further improvement of waterways in which the same may be situated, under the direction of the Secretary of War.

I have heard the power of Congress to so provide questioned on several occasions at least, but I apprehend that no one will be heard very seriously to assert that if Congress, in the construction of a public work of this character, develops some power as incidental to the work of navigation, it must either make a gift of the excess power which it thus develops or allow it to run idle and useless. For instance, down at Panama the construction of the great Gatun Dam was necessary to the proper prosecution of that work. There was accumulated a great lake, and the natural overflow of the lake, and particularly the overflow in times of the great floods which occur in that region, is utilized for the development of power, and that power is utilized for the transport of the vessels through the locks of the canal.

I apprehend—indeed, I know—they develop more power there than they have occasion to use for the primary purpose for which it was developed. No one, I undertake to say, would assert that the Government of the United States has no power to sell that excess power. I take it that, inasmuch as a provision to that effect was incorporated in the bill, it is the view of the gentlemen who have framed it that that power and right does exist.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Does the Senator see no distinction between the absolute ownership and right of the United States in power developed at Panama and the power of the Government to enter a State for purposes under the Constitution of navigation only, and then proceed, by reason of that right, only to make a charge out of an element that the State itself owns as against the Federal Government?

Mr. WALSH. Of course that is quite beside the question that I am endeavoring to debate at this time. Take the great work conducted by the Government at The Dalles, in the Columbia River, by the operation of which that river was made navigable from the sea to Lewiston up the Snake and to Priest Rapids, in the State of Washington. By the expenditure of some additional money a very considerable amount of power would be developed at that place. I ask the Senator from Arizona if it is his idea that the Government would have no right to sell that power?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not think the Government has any rightful power whatever over anything developed by reason of the improvement of the navigation of the streams within a State.

Mr. WALSH. What would the Senator have the Government do with the power?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I would have the Government do what the Government has a right to do under the Constitution, and that would be to attend to the navigation of the stream and interfere with no State when the State did not interfere with the navigation.

Mr. WALSH. Perhaps I ought not to precipitate this discussion, but the Senator has not answered the question as to what he would have the Government do. The framers of the bill have deemed—and it seems to me deemed wisely—that if in that work power is incidentally developed the Government ought to dispose of the power as a prudent, careful business man on the best terms that could be obtained.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. To that extent I would disagree with the committee in its report on the bill. I think it is a presumption on the part of the committee.

Mr. WALSH. However that may be, Mr. President, that is the evident theory of the bill. That being the case, I can see no difference between that and authorizing a private individual to go on and do exactly the same work, giving to the Government whatever would be a just part accruing to it and which would come to it if it itself did the improvement work.

For both these reasons, then, Mr. President, I entertain no doubt at all, so far as the power of Congress is concerned, that the provisions of the amendment are entirely without good ground for exception. Now as to the policy or wisdom of it.

I referred, Mr. President, to the great work conducted by the Government of the United States in the improvement of the Columbia River, a navigable stream. If it itself developed an additional amount of power which it thus disposed of why should not that excess thus derived from that work be put into a fund for the improvement of that particular river?

So the bill provides, and so, Mr. President, if a stream which ought to be developed for purposes of navigation may likewise be made the source of power out of which a return can be obtained for the Government, why should not the power possibilities of that river be utilized for the purpose of the improvement of it for navigation? Why should it be given away? Why should it not be utilized, and would not that be an entirely appropriate use?

But, Mr. President, there is in my judgment an additional reason why this should be done. Anyone who knows anything about the development of water power has recognized that in many cases it can be developed at an initial cost that is very, very low and that in others it can be developed only at a cost that approximates the cost of the production of power by steam. In other words, whatever you do there is going to be a very large margin between the cost of producing power in the different plants.

I speak now, Mr. President, about the development of different plants upon the same navigable stream or upon navigable streams in the same region, the dams on which will supply the same market. But, Mr. President, you must bear in mind that the power plants which are thus established upon navigable streams are going to come into competition with the dams that are constructed upon the public lands and you can not burden one without putting it under a disadvantage as with respect to the other. The Public Lands Committee has reported a bill which provides for the disposition of power sites upon the public domain, and it contains a provision to the effect that the permittee shall pay for the privilege he exercises of occupying the public lands an annual rental which shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hoursepower produced at the property affected. I read for instance from section 8 of that bill as reported by the Senate committee, as follows:

> That for the occupancy and use of lands and other property of the United States permitted under this act, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to specify in the lease and to collect reasonable charges or rentals for all land leased, which charges or rentals shall not exceed an amount equal or equivalent to 25 cents per horsepower-year for the actual power.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. JONES. Has that provision been reported by the committee?

Mr. WALSH. I so understand.

Mr. JONES. I did not know that.

Mr. WALSH. I so understand. The bill itself provides that—

> The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to specify in the lease and to collect charges or rentals for all lands leased, which charges or rentals may, in the discretion of the Secretary, be measured by the power developed and sold or used by the lessee for any purpose other than the operation of the plant.

Mr. JONES. That I understood had been reported. I do not know that the limitation the Senator just referred to as a maximum rent had been reported favorably by the committee. I hope it has been reported that way.

Mr. WALSH. This has been furnished me, and I assume that it is correct.

But, Mr. President, the bill as thus reported contemplates that the power plants that are thus located upon the public domain shall be burdened with an annual charge, and a charge that in all probability will be computed on the basis of the horsepower produced and sold. Now, take it in my State. I referred the other day to the fact that the Kootenai River is a navigable stream. A power plant upon that stream will be governed by the provisions of the bill which is now before us for consideration if it shall become a law. One who puts a dam upon that stream for the development of power will be under no obligation whatever to pay a dollar to the United States for the privilege which he enjoys.

The Yaak River is a nonnavigable branch of the Kootenai River. Both of these streams are capable of producing power of enormous volume and amount. They are exactly in the same neighborhood; they will supply exactly the same market; and yet the power plant on the little Yaak River will be burdened with an annual charge and the power plant on the great Kootenai will go without a dollar. I ask if that is right? I ask if that is fair? I ask you why you should endeavor to lessen the burdens upon the great plants that must be developed, if they are developed at all, by great aggregations of capital, and burden the little plants, that are on the side streams, that will be developed in small amounts, possibly 1,000 horsepower or 500 horsepower or something of that character. You charge them an annual rental; they will be called upon to pay an annual royalty to the Government, depending upon the amount of power they produce, but the others will be allowed to go free. Mr. President, I submit that it is not a fair proposition at all to burden the power plants of the West upon the public domain with an annual charge, and to allow those in the East to go without any charge whatever.

There is a third reason, Mr. President, why this ought not to be done.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. SHIELDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana, in view of his statement that it is unfair to put a burden on the plants in the West and not on those in the East, whether he favors placing a burden on those in the West?

Mr. WALSH. I do. I think that I could not otherwise justify myself in coming to the Congress of the United States. I tell you, I speak for the people of my State, and I speak for the men with the money, who are willing to go into the business, and who are here praying for an opportunity to go into the business, when I say that they are perfectly willing to pay a reasonable charge annually for the right to occupy the public lands with power plants.

Mr. SHIELDS. Now, will the Senator explain why it follows that it is just to make an illegal exaction, as I see it, upon the owners of water power in the navigable rivers in the West merely because he and other citizens of the West voluntarily advocate a tax or a charge upon themselves?

Mr. WALSH. Of course, the Senator from Tennessee will find no fault with me when I say that I can not concede that he is correct in saying that it is an illegal charge. Of course, he will have to ask me the question upon the basis of my own idea about the matter. I endeavored to explain my notion that there is nothing illegal about it, but that it is perfectly legitimate under the Constitution to make this charge.

Mr. SHIELDS. I understood the Senator to take that position; but, of course, he understands that perhaps beyond any question a majority of the Senate disagree with him and believe that Congress has no power whatever to levy such a tax where it has no proprietary interest in the river or in the land adjacent to the river.

Mr. WALSH. I would scarcely agree as to that; but now, if the Senator will ask me any question upon the basis of my understanding of the power of Congress, I shall be very glad to answer him.

I do say that, conceding the power of the National Government to exact this charge in respect to dams in navigable streams, it is unjust to allow this development to go on in the East without a charge and to impose a charge upon the dams in the West, which as to the greater part must of necessity be upon the public lands.

Mr. SHIELDS. Who is it that is proposing to impose this tax, I will ask the Senator? Is the Senator not from the West, and is he not here advocating a tax upon his own people?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. And then, proceeding with that as a basis——

Mr. WALSH. I am advocating the same imposition upon the other people.

Mr. SHIELDS. Let me finish. The Senator comes here advocating a bill to impose a tax upon his own people, and after getting that established, or with his hopes to have it established, he now says, "You ought to pay in something, too."

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Montana recognizes that it will be impossible to get the legislation that he is so extremely desirous of securing without a provision of that character.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will ask the Senator from Montana a further question. Have not all the water powers outside of the public domain, to which the bill under consideration would apply in the State of Montana, been developed, and therefore, this charge, which he now proposes to place upon the development of water power in the East would not affect his constituents?

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the Senator from Tennessee that all of the development in the State of Montana thus far is upon those waters that are not navigable in the interstate sense.

Mr. SHIELDS. I understood from the Senator's speech at the Western States Water Power Conference in September last, at Portland, Oreg.—I quote:

> Development of water power in our State has progressed with unusual celerity, practically all of the great sites held in private ownership now being occupied.

Therefore this tax which the Senator now proposes to impose would not affect his constituents owning these sites. I will proceed with the quotation:

> The remainder of the large sites are upon the public domain. Further development is practically arrested until some legislation is enacted.

Mr. WALSH. That is the situation exactly. Take the great power site on the Pend Oreille River. The Pend Oreille River empties Flathead Lake. Flathead Lake is the largest body of fresh water between the Mississippi River and the Pacific Ocean. It is a great natural reservoir 30 miles long by 20 miles wide. The region drained is an immense territory. That lake empties itself through this river; it tumbles over a series of cascades 7 miles in length that are capable of producing 250,000 horsepower, as much as the total development in our State. The lands on both sides are public lands. They are reserved from disposition under the existing condition of things. Do you wonder that I am here urging that we give consideration to a measure that has some show of being enacted into law?

Moreover, Mr. President, as is well known, practically every developed power in our State belongs to the Montana Power Co. I do not want to say anything by way of criticism of that organization. It has exhibited in the conduct of its business a most commendable public spirit. It is extending its business into all sections of our State. The Senator from Tennessee the other day, in setting forth the great uses to which electricity was being applied, told you that in the city of Billings there were 600 homes in which all the cooking they did was done by electricity. It is being extended everywhere, and most liberal terms are being made. Out in front of my city is the fertile Prickly Pear Valley. That company is furnishing power to the farmers in that valley so that they can get water at much less cost than even the settlers under the reclamation projects. Twelve thousand five hundred acres are now under cultivation, irrigated by water that is pumped by this company by electrical power. As I say, however, practically every power in the State is in their hands, and everything else is tied up. We are anxious to have this legislation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I understood the Senator from Montana to say that many of the very large power plants in his State were developed. Is that correct?

Mr. WALSH. The fact about the matter, I will say to the Senator, is that our capacities aggregate 5,000,000 horsepower, and only 250,000 have been developed. I will say that the site of which I spoke, the Pend d'Oreille site, is perhaps the greatest in our State.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In any event, a very large power has been developed in the State of Montana by private corporations, as I understand. Now, I should like to ask the Senator from Montana if they pay any tax to anybody?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then, does the Senator think it is fair to force a tax upon the gentlemen who are to come after them and invest their money and in less favored sections in new enterprises? Is not that a discrimination that is hardly fair?

Mr. WALSH. That is a very pertinent question which the Senator puts, but, really, you know, it presents an inquiry that addresses itself to legislators whenever the present situation of conditions is to be improved. Of course, the people who got in first, who got in on the "ground floor," were pioneers, and they were entitled to an advantage. Why, Mr. President, whenever you go to improve the condition of things you have got to put the new man under a disadvantage as compared with the men who have gone before. For instance, we used to grant street railways rights in perpetuity, the opportunity to occupy the streets of our cities for an unlimited period, and in many cases provision was made concerning the charge that they might make, and that was in perpetuity.

After a time, however, when the population increases and the city builds up, another man will come along and he also wants a franchise. Well, would you have the community bound up so that they would have to give a new man all the advantages and all the rights that were given to the first man, lest you put him at a disadvantage, I ask the Senator?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the Senator has so candidly and directly answered the question I put to him, that I should like to ask him another. In case the Senator succeeds in securing the levy of this tax upon the power hereafter to be developed, I should like to ask him who ultimately will pay that charge—whether or not it would not fall upon the consumer?

Mr. WALSH. Unquestionably it would. I have listened to Senators talking about a tariff, and I have listened to gentlemen stating that the duty on wool never finds its way into the coat one wears on one's back. I never subscribed to that doctrine. Beyond question, in some way or other, every dollar that is paid in the way of a license for this permit will have to be paid by the consumer. Therefore, Mr. President——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. Wait until I answer the question. Therefore I insist, sir, that whatever there is realized from this source shall not go into the Federal Treasury for general purposes, but shall be utilized in the very community from which it comes; and, accordingly, the provision in the other bill coming from the Public Lands Committee is that every dollar that is received from this source shall go into the reclamation fund for the reclamation of arid lands in the very community from which the money comes; and when that is returned by the settlers, one half of it goes to the State from which it comes and the other to the reclamation fund.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator one more question, and then I will not trouble him further. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana if he does not distinguish between a dam built in a navigable stream for the purposes of navigation exclusively by the Government, where the Government is the riparian owner, where the Government takes care of the flowage rights, and a dam built by private enterprise, by private capital, near the same place in the same river, which dam, when completed, they turn over for navigation purposes to the Government of the United States free of cost? I will ask if the Senator can not distinguish between those two situations?

Mr. WALSH. I do distinguish between the two; I recognize that there is a vast distinction; but I recognize also that they are identical in this particular, that in each case it can readily be conceived that there will be an excess derived from the power developed which belongs to the Government and which ought to be utilized by the Government; and, to my mind, it does not make a bit of difference whether the Government does the work itself, and thus acquires the power, or whether it lets the privilege to a private individual and asks for a portion of what it would get itself if it made the improvement.

Now, Mr. President, the third reason why I think this amendment ought to be made is this——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question before he goes to the third reason.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator says that a tax should be imposed upon the power generated upon public lands, and that therefore there should be a tax imposed upon the power generated upon navigable streams. I would ask him whether he would have any objection to providing that in both instances there shall be no compensation to or charge by the Government?

Mr. WALSH. I would, unquestionably, because I do not know how I would justify myself before the people of the United States in giving to a private person the great, valuable power sites upon the public domain. Let me say a word now to the Senator from Colorado. I have referred to the Pend Oreille site. Why, Mr. President, I have not the slightest doubt in the world that if that site were put up at public auction it would bring $3,000,000. I do not know how I would justify myself before the people of the United States if I agreed to turn that over to somebody for nothing.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator recognize the fact that the States have certain rights, especially in water powers, and that the charge which the Senator proposes to make is, according to decisions of the courts, to be levied on something which belongs to the States and not to the Nation?

Mr. WALSH. I do not think so at all.

Mr. SHAFROTH. As to nonnavigable streams?

Mr. WALSH. I am speaking about nonnavigable streams now, sir. I think that that is an entirely erroneous idea. The Government owns the land. I subscribe to the doctrine asserted by the Senator from Colorado, that the State owns the water of its streams. Before I came to the Senate I argued that question in the Supreme Court of the United States, and I wrote an elaborate brief upholding that view, and I take that position now. The Government of the United States does not own the water of the Pend Oreille River at all, but it owns the land upon both sides of the river, and you can not build a dam there unless you get that land. The Government of the United States owns the land, and it may charge just exactly what it pleases for that land. If it so elects, it can say to one who desires to occupy that land, "We will permit you to occupy this land for a period of 50 years, you to pay us for its occupancy 25 cents per horsepower for each horsepower you develop."

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does the Senator think it would be fair for the Government to prescribe such terms and not give the right of condemnation, so that the fair value of the land, consisting probably of rocks and canyons, could be ascertained, instead of a large amount being assessed against the company?

Mr. WALSH. The difference between the Senator and myself about that is simply this: The Senator thinks that the land has no value except for agricultural purposes or for some purpose like that. I think differently. I think the land is immensely valuable because of its commanding character as a power site, and that the Government of the United States is entitled to take that into consideration in disposing of the land just as a private citizen would do.

Now, concerning the condemnation feature, I will say to the Senator from Colorado that, as we both know, the question has been raised that the State has the right to condemn public lands of the United States; that it can take them away from the United States by the power of eminent domain. We may differ about that, but I can not subscribe to that doctrine.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, Mr. President, in a condemnation proceeding for the acquirement of a site for a reservoir, for instance—and I am sure the Senator from Montana has had considerable experience along that line—does he think, under any procedure or under any decision of any court, that you could count as an item of damage to be assessed for the taking of the property a natural condition, such as a hill which helps to form the reservoir site?

Mr. WALSH. In answer to that I will say to the Senator from Colorado that the question which he propounds to me now has, in my judgment, been quite definitely determined by the Supreme Court of the United States. I refer to a case which I think is found in Ninety-seventh United States. It was for the condemnation of an island in the Mississippi River, and doubtless the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] will be able to give the details of the case. It was a rocky island, of such character as the Senator has suggested; it was nothing but rocks. You could not grow a thing on it; there was no mineral on it of any character at all. A boom company wanted to condemn it, and the Supreme Court of the United States held that its value for boom purposes was proper to be submitted to the jury. So, in determining the question of the value of a power site, if condemnation proceedings could be availed of at all, the value of that property as a site for a dam for the development of power is a proper element to be taken into consideration.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The rule, as I understand, Mr. President, is to consider what the site is worth for all purposes. That is an element to be taken into consideration.

Mr. WALSH. For "any" purpose.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; not for "any purpose," but for "all purposes." That is my understanding.

Mr. WALSH. I will get the decision and give the Senator the language.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have known instances where there have been attempts to condemn land for the purpose of making a reservoir, when the attorneys for the owners of the land would insist that, because there was a hill that formed a part of the dam itself, it should be held at a very high figure by the jury; and the courts have invariably, in cases that I have examined, said no; that it could not be considered in the determination of the amount that the land was worth because of the fact that it would amount to making a piece of land, which was practically worthless, of such high value as to make it worth almost as much as a part of the embankment of the reservoir itself.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say that the Senator from Montana no doubt represents the people of Montana when he says that they are in favor of this legislation; but I must say to the Senator that that is not the view held throughout the West. So far as the people of my State are concerned, they believe that the water in the streams belongs to the people of the State, and that the United States Government has no more right to hinder the construction of a power plant than a farmer would have the right to stop a railroad because the railroad wanted to go through his land, when the railroad has the right to go through his land under condemnation proceedings. I must say, Mr. President, that while the view which the Senator takes may be the view of Montana, it is not the view of most of the Western States.

I wish to say further to the Senator that, while no doubt, as he states, he honestly believes that there are people ready to enter into leasing contracts with the Government, I have no doubt that under the treatment which lessees of the Government have received in the past 20 years people will be very slow in their efforts to secure leasing contracts.

I wish further to call the attention of the Senator, if he will permit me, to another fact. I have no doubt the Senator speaks in the utmost good faith—and he is always earnest and honest in supporting his contentions—but when the Alaskan bill was before the Senate the Senator said on the floor of the Senate that there were men then waiting in Washington for the purpose of acquiring coal leases in Alaska, and yet I have inquired at the Department of the Interior as to whether there have been any leases made there, and I find that not one has been made up to this time.

The opportunity of leasing and paying a royalty to the Federal Government is not one that is going to be seized readily by the people, because, Mr. President, the Government has heretofore revoked permits without rhyme or reason, without suggesting a cause for its action. When the permit system was inaugurated for the construction of water-power plants it was said, "All we want to do is to stop one company from monopolizing; we want the privileges of a company, if it fails to proceed with construction work, to end; and, therefore, we want the privilege of revoking the permit." But there was one Secretary of the Interior who, without notice to a single water-power company, and without any trial, issued an order revoking 40 permits, when there had already been constructed and were in operation power plants which had cost millions of dollars and which at that very minute were transmitting electricity to various communities.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. The general policy of leasing, of course, is a most interesting one; but does the Senator understand that this bill before us is just that kind of a bill?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I understand that there are certain features of that kind, as the Senator has said; but it does seem to me——

Mr. WALSH. Excuse me. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the bill before us, as it has been reported by the committee and recommended for passage, is a leasing bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That may be; but there are features of this bill that I would rather have eliminated.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator will understand that the bill does not give the dam builder a perpetual right to occupy the stream, but it gives him a right only for a limited period of 50 years.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; but I recognize, if the Senator will permit me, that there is a great difference between a navigable stream which the State has not the absolute right to control and concerning which it has to make some kind of an arrangement with the National Government, and a stream the waters of which are recognized by every court decision to belong to the State. That is one reason why this bill is not as perfect as I should like it to be, yet, notwithstanding that, it is, in my judgment, infinitely a better bill than the bill providing for the construction of water-power plants upon the public domain.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, Mr. President, I do not want to institute any comparison. I want to present now the third reason I have for believing that this would be a wise policy.

I adverted in the beginning to the fact that power plants upon the same navigable stream will be competing with each other under different conditions. One will have an advantage over the other. I think we could very properly equalize the advantages by a charge. So, likewise, a power plant on a navigable stream will be competing with a power plant upon the public domain, but not on a navigable stream. We could equalize the difference between them very properly by imposing a charge on the permit to occupy the navigable stream, if it has any advantage by reason of its location and ease of development over the plant upon the nonnavigable stream located upon the public lands.

Now, I want to call attention to the fact that you will find exactly the same discrepancy between the production of power by steam and the production of power by falling water. Of course that is a matter of no great consequence with us, where there is a superabundance of power, and at present, at least, a very narrow market. The great difficulty in the way of power development in our section of the country is to get the market where the power can be utilized. When the development first began the power was utilized only for operating street railways and the electric-light plant in the city of Helena. Subsequently a transmission line was constructed to Butte, a distance of 75 miles, and that city was lighted with electricity and the street cars were run with the current obtained. Afterwards they induced the mine operators to put in electric hoists, instead of hoists operated by steam power, thus opening up another great source for the consumption of power. Later, you will remember, that the whole line of the Butte, Anaconda, and Pacific Railroad Co., operating between the city of Butte, where the mines are, and the city of Anaconda, where the smelters are, was electrified and power was consumed in great quantities for that purpose. Here within 60 days 115 miles of the main line of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul road through our State began to be operated by electrical power; and they are at present installing equipment for the purpose of operating about 450 miles, extending from Hamilton, in my State, over into the State of Idaho. That affords a great market for power; and, of course, if that road is electrified the competing lines, the Great Northern and the Northern Pacific, also traversing my State from east to west, will in the course of time, and in my judgment a very short time, be obliged to go to the same source of power; for I state here as a most remarkable fact that the records of the Butte, Anaconda, and Pacific road disclose that their cost for power, operating electrically, is just one-third what it was when they operated by steam, and the total expense of operation has been reduced something like 33⅓ per cent. I have no doubt that a similar saving in the cost of operating, particularly in the mountain grades, will be shown by the experiment now being conducted by the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul road.

Electrical power is particularly applicable to the operation of railroads and mountain grades; for, remarkable as the fact may be, the engine—the electric motor—in descending the grade is transformed into a generator which generates electricity by reason of the momentum of the train, which is thrown into the line and assists in pulling up the train that is ascending the mountain upon the other side. So that the cost of railroad operation in the mountain sections is reduced almost to that of transportation across the plains.

So the market is developing; but, still, with our five millions of possibilities, it will be a long time before the market is so great as to consume our available power. As a consequence of that, in order to get people to use electrical power at all, it became necessary to reduce the cost, and to continue to reduce it, until it had been extended as I have indicated.

For instance, when they first began to use it, the street railway in my town paid $50 per horsepower. Afterwards, when they introduced it into the mains in Butte, it was furnished to them at $35 a horsepower, and now it is furnished to the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul road at something like $20 per horsepower. So that the price is governed not at all by the cost of producing power by steam in that section of the country, but rather by the cost of producing the electrical energy itself.

But the situation is quite different in the East. Take New England, for instance. They can not generate enough power by their streams in New England to come anywhere near supplying the demand that there is in that country for power. We will assume, for instance, that it costs $60 or $75 a horsepower to produce power by steam in New England; but we will assume that you give some one an opportunity to generate power by damming a navigable stream in New England, and that by that process he is able to produce power at $30 and to sell it at a good profit for that price. There is not enough to supply all, and steam will cost $60 per horsepower. I suppose that in all those States, or practically all of them, they have public-service commissions that undertake, as we do in our State, to regulate the price at which power can be furnished to those who desire it. But what shall a public-service commission do in a case of that kind? What can they do? They can not fix the rate for power at $50, becaues all of the steam plants would go out of business; and if they fix it at $60 or $65 or $70, leaving a margin to the steam plant, the water-power plant is charging very much more than it of right ought to charge. So I believe that an opportunity ought to be given to permit an equalization in the price of power in the operations of the various regulatory boards of the various States. These are the reasons that impel me.

Mr. President, if we get through with the question of power it will be asserted always that we want to check development. This is the one thing which it is said will be unduly burdensome, and thus prevent the further investment of capital in the development of water powers. You will observe by the bill to which I called your attention that a maximum of 25 cents per horsepower is put in. That is to say, the Secretary of the Interior may make a charge as high as 25 cents a horsepower. Various amounts have been suggested. It has been suggested that the charge might be as high as 50 cents a horsepower. Some people have suggested, even, that it should be as high as $1 a horsepower. A new development at Great Falls, in my State, began operating last summer, amounting to 90,000 horsepower. Twenty-five cents per horsepower would mean a contribution, if that were under Federal control, of $22,500 a year. Does anybody have any kind of an idea that the imposition of a charge of $22,500 a year in the case of a plant developing 90,000 horsepower would prevent the development of that power?

I told you, for instance, that we had reduced the cost of power in the State of Montana so that the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Co. now pays $20 per horsepower. Suppose there were a charge of even $1 put on, so that they had to pay $21 per horsepower. Has anybody any kind of an idea that they would decline to electrify under those circumstances or conditions?

Mr. President, this is no burden at all upon the development of water powers. It can not be argued that it is. It is simply a desire, in the first place, a disposition, to believe that there is not any power to do this; that the right of Congress to exact this contribution in consideration of the valuable privilege that is extended does not exist. I think that if we can pass that point we can scarcely justify ourselves in awarding these privileges, of such enormous value in many cases, without making some adequate return to the Government.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, this subject has received a great deal of attention from Congress for the last 10 years, but it is now presented again. I think it will serve a good purpose to refer to the authorities relating to the power and jurisdiction of Congress over navigable streams.

The Congress, in my opinion, has no power to require compensation of persons or corporations constructing a dam in a navigable river for the development of water power as a condition to the permit or authority for placing the structure in the stream.

The States in which the navigable rivers are situated have sovereign power over the beds and waters of navigable rivers, and the States and the riparian proprietors, as the laws of the State in question may provide, have title to and own them. This seems to be settled beyond controversy. The first case coming before the Supreme Court in which the question arose was that of Pollard against Hagan, Third Howard, page 212, and the rule then announced has been adhered to ever since. It is there said:

> By the preceding course of reasoning we have arrived at these general conclusions: First, the shores of navigable waters and the soils under them were not granted to the United States by the Constitution, but were reserved to the States, respectively; second, the new States have the same rights, sovereignty, and jurisdiction over this subject as the original States; third, the right of the United States to public land and the power of Congress to make all needful rules and regulations for the sale and disposition thereof conferred no power to grant to the plaintiffs the land (tidewater land) in controversy.

I will refer to only two of the later cases announcing the law upon the subject.

That of Kansas against Colorado, Two hundred and sixth United States, page 46, was brought by the State of Kansas against the State of Colorado and certain corporations organized under the laws of the latter State to restrain them from diverting the waters of the Arkansas River for the irrigation of lands in Colorado to such an extent as to deprive the citizens of the State of Kansas of the same.

The United States filed an intervening petition, claiming the right to control the waters of the river to aid in the reclamation of arid public lands. This petition was dismissed, and the reasons therefor are summed up in the syllabus of the case in these words:

The Government of the United States is one of enumerated powers; that it has no inherent powers of sovereignty; that the enumeration of the powers granted is to be found in the Constitution of the United States, and in that alone; that the manifest purpose of the tenth amendment to the Constitution is to put beyond dispute the proposition that all the powers not granted are reserved to the people, and that if in the changes of the years further powers ought to be possessed by Congress they must be obtained by a new grant from the people. While Congress has general legislative jurisdiction over the Territories and may control the flow of waters in their streams, it has no power to control a like flow within the limits of a State except to preserve or improve the navigability of the stream; that the full control over those waters is, subject to the exception named, vested in the State. Hence the intervening petition of the United States is dismissed, without prejudice to any action which it may see fit to take in respect to the use of the water for maintaining or improving the navigability of the river.

In the opinion of the court, after a full discussion of the question, followed by the citation of many cases, page 93, it is said:

It is useless to pursue the inquiry further in this direction. It is enough for the purposes of this case that each State has full jurisdiction over the lands within its borders, including the beds of streams and other waters.

Mr. Justice Lurton, in the case of Chandler-Dunbar Co., Two hundred and twenty-ninth United States, page 60, says:

The technical title to the beds of the navigable rivers of the United States is either in the States in which the rivers are situated or in the owners of the lands bordering upon such rivers. Whether in one or the other is a question of local law.

The States have such interest that they may maintain suits to protect the waters of navigable rivers which flow through their boundaries from pollution, as was held in the case of Missouri against Illinois, One hundred and eighty-fifth United States, or to prevent an excessive and unlawful use of the waters, as was held in Kansas against Colorado.

In many of the public-land States there are provisions in their constitutions, and generally statutes upon the subject, declaring that the title to all waters is in the State. In fact, there are more constitutional provisions and more statutes upon this subject in the public-land States than in the other States of the Union. The declaration of the constitution of Montana upon this subject is very specific. I shall not stop to read it, however. The rule in nearly all of the Western States is collated in a report that was presented by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] some years ago, and is accessible to anyone desiring to examine it.

The States may retain the title to the lands under the waters or grant it to individuals and hold the waters flowing over it in trust for the public. The riparian proprietors may acquire a fee simple title to the bed of the stream if allowed by the laws of the State within which the stream flows, but their interest in the waters is only that of usufruct. It is true that the sovereignty and title of the States and individuals in the beds of navigable rivers and their waters is in all cases subject to the power of the Congress to control and use them for purposes of navigation, and of the necessity and extent of the control and use required it is the sole and exclusive judge. From its determination there is no appeal. This power springs from that to regulate commerce and is of that class of powers defined as the police power. Within the sphere of its control the power of Congress is absolute, unlimited, and paramount.

The Federal Government, however, has no proprietary interest in navigable rivers, and can not interfere with the control and use of them by the States and riparian proprietors except through the power of Congress to regulate commerce—as applied in this case to facilitate navigation. The power of Congress is to control the easement of right of way for navigation which the general public has in navigable streams, to which servitude the rights of riparian proprietors must in all cases yield and the control by the States yield when Congress exercises its higher power of regulation.

In other words, the power of Congress is the same as the police power which the States exercise in the control of highways within their territories. The States control their highways for transportation purposes, and in the exercise of this power their authority is unlimited, but they can not use the highways for any other purposes than transportation. They can not sell or lease them. The distinction between rights in property and the power to control property through the police power is too obvious to be elaborated upon.

The United States having no property in navigable streams, the Congress, as its agent, can not constitutionally sell or lease the beds and waters of those streams for any purpose, its power being confined to the control of them for the purposes of navigation. When it attempts to do more, either directly or by coercion of the riparian owner, it is guilty of confiscation of private property.

Again, the power vested in Congress is to regulate commerce, not to engage in commerce.

In Gibbons against Ogden (9 Wheat., 1) the Supreme Court of the United States, in construing the commerce clause, defined the power of regulation as that "to prescribe the rule according to which commerce should be carried on." This definition has never been departed from, and is followed by the courts to-day.

The selling or leasing of the waters and the power produced by them can not be claimed to be a regulation of navigation on the stream with any pretense of reason. It is engaging in trade, in commerce, in the most common and usual form.

Nor does Article IV of the Constitution, section 3, paragraph 2, providing that Congress shall have the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property of the United States, affect the question, because the property in question is not that of the United States.

The case of the United States against Chandler-Dunbar Co. does not hold that the Federal Government has any proprietary interest in navigable waters under the commerce clause of the Constitution, or that Congress can lawfully use them for commercial purposes in the exercise of its power to regulate commerce.

The act of Congress which was involved in that case, chapter 264, section 11, acts of 1909, asserted that the ownership in fee simple absolute by the United States to all lands and property of every kind and description north of the present St. Marys Falls Ship Canal was necessary for the purposes of navigation, and provided for acquiring such title by condemnation.

Section 12 of the act provided that the right to the flow of water—the riparian, water-power, and other rights—then or thereafter owned by the United States in the St. Marys River, should be forever conserved for the benefit of the Government of the United States, primarily for the purposes of navigation, and incidentally for the purpose of having the water power developed either for the direct use of the United States or for lease through the Secretary of War. The United States is the riparian proprietor of the lands and water in question, acquired by it primarily for navigation purposes, and the power is merely to lease or sell the excess of the power created by the structures erected in the river. The Chandler-Dunbar case was merely a case where the United States as riparian proprietor proposed to use its property, acquired by condemnation, in the bed and waters of the stream.

Mr. Justice Lurton, in his opinion, page 72, lays stress on the fact that section 11 of the act declared that the property was taken for a public purpose, and that the twelfth section declared that purpose to be primarily for the benefit of navigation. He says:

If the primary purpose is legitimate we can see no sound objection to leasing an excess of water over the needs of the Government.

And again, on page 73, recognizing the closeness of the case, he says:

It is at best not clear how Chandler-Dunbar Co. can be heard to object to the selling of any excess of water power which may result from the construction of such controlling or remedial works as shall be found advisable for the improvement of navigation, inasmuch as it had no property right in the river which has been taken. It has therefore no interest whether the Government permit the excess of power to go to waste or be made the means of producing some returns upon the great expenditure.

The case of Green Bay Canal Co. v. Patton Paper Co. (172 U. S.), is cited by Mr. Justice Lurton as an authority sustaining the right of the Government to charge for the excess power, and is the sole authority he cites. That case wholly fails to sustain the proposition advanced in this case. The question involved had been practically passed upon in a case reported in One hundred and forty-second United States, involving the same improvement in the Wisconsin and Fox Rivers. Neither of these cases involved the commerce clause of the Constitution, and the court did not there decide that the Congress could authorize the construction of a dam in a navigable river for the purpose, secondary it may be, of developing water power for sale, or even that it could sell water power incidentally developed by a dam for navigable purposes. The facts in that case were that the United States granted to the State of Wisconsin the lands upon the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers to bear the expense of improving the navigation of those rivers.

Wisconsin accepted the grant and began the improvement. The burden became too heavy, and it directed the property sold, including the water power which, by legislation, it had before reserved for the use of the State for commercial purposes. The entire property came into the hands of the corporation which finally disposed of the same to the United States, reserving the water power created by the dams. The question really was, whether the State had the power to create or reserve the water power for manufacturing purposes, or, in other words, to engage in business, and whether there was a valid reservation of this water power vested in the corporation selling to the United States. This was also a case where the State and its vendees were riparian proprietors and had property rights, and, of course, it was held that they could dispose of their property, whether in its original form or that of a product—the water power created by dams.

But it is suggested that Congress having absolute jurisdiction over the construction of structures in navigable waters can forbid the owners of riparian property from using it, although that use be not only consistent with the rights of the public but beneficial to navigation, unless the owners will comply with such conditions as may be imposed upon them. Call it what you may please, frame it in any form, the proposition that Congress may impose conditions in such cases as this upon the owners of the beds and waters of navigable streams, is not only the commonest tyranny but blackmail in its worst form. It is no better than the action of the grafting policeman who demands tribute of the saloon keeper over whom he has authority in enforcing police regulations, under the penalty of declaring his place disorderly and closing it up for nonpayment.

To impose such conditions would be a gross abuse of the police power to regulate transportation upon navigable rivers.

Mr. President, I believe it is conceded by everyone that the United States has no proprietary interest in navigable rivers, either in the waters, beds, or banks; that its sole power is one of regulation of the public highways which they constitute. Yet under that power it is proposed that Congress shall say to the riparian proprietors: "You can not use your property, although you do it in such a manner as will not obstruct navigation but materially aid it, with your own private capital, unless you pay to the United States a tax to be distributed throughout the whole country."

I can not see anything but the grossest oppression in such an exaction.

Charges of this kind can not be sustained as a tax. Congress has no power to levy such a tax. Its power to raise revenue is confined to taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, uniform throughout the United States. These charges can not be made uniform nor apportioned among the States, as the Constitution requires; nor can the power to fix the rate of taxation be delegated; nor can the levy of a tax originate in this body.

The refusal of Congress to allow the owners of the beds and waters of navigable streams to develop the water power of which their property is susceptible, although according to plans approved by and under the supervision of the authorities which Congress has given control of navigable rivers, and by means which will greatly improve and facilitate navigation, is unquestionably a gross and despotic abuse of power.

Upon what principle can the development of the great natural resources of the country for the prosperity and happiness of the people be arbitrarily prohibited, solely because the owners of the property will not submit to an unjust exaction?

There is no constitutional authority for such arbitrary deprivation of the use of private property. A law which forbids a property owner from using it for a lawful purpose without payment of a charge for which there is no constitutional warrant is as much confiscation as if the property itself is taken.

I was glad to hear the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] restate his position upon this subject. In a very able speech, which he delivered before the Western States Water Power Conference last September, he said:

> That, it is said, is in contravention of the doctrine that the States own the waters of the streams, because the payment so computed will be for the use of the waters of the stream and not for the land.
>
> Now, do not go away with any misconception about this matter. You see in me an advocate of the doctrine that the State owns the water of the streams within its borders, navigable or nonnavigable. I am not developing the theory of the Federal ownership of streams at all, and I do not stand up, taking the attitude I do on that subject, for the purpose of gaining favor with an audience with which it is popular. I argued that question before the Supreme Court of the United States once.
>
> Do not be misled by any statement such as was made here yesterday, that there is no question about the State's ownership of the waters of streams flowing over or across the public lands, and that no lawyer will assert the contrary, because when I argued that matter before the court of last resort the gentleman who was opposed to me put up a plausible, and it must be conceded, a strong argument for his side. He had most respectable and persuasive authority to sustain him, and the question was so doubtful that the Supreme Court dodged it, and it remains undecided to this day.
> Bear in mind, however, that that is my stand upon the matter. I am not going to give up any control of the State over its waters. But the plan proposed contemplates nothing of the kind, nor does it imply Government ownership of the waters of our streams.

That is the opinion the Senator from Montana has expressed here on the floor to-day, as I understand, and one, I think, entirely consistent with all the authorities upon the subject.

I was also struck with another statement the Senator made in a subsequent address to the same conference. I quote:

> It is said, and I have heard it asserted, that the amount charged will not find itself included in the rates. However, I do not entertain that kind of an idea at all.
> You hear a whole lot in Congress in the tariff debate that the tariff duties do not find themselves expressed in the charges made for the commodities upon which the tariff is levied. I do not give my adherence to that doctrine at all. It will be there.
> Whatever charges are made for the use of the power sites, those charges will go into the general account of the company, just as the taxes will go in and just as all other expenses go, and it will be an element in the rates, and I would never give my assent to a measure of this character, and lay a tax upon the people of these Western States to go into the General Treasury of the United States for the improvement of the harbors and rivers of New York State, for instance. But that money is going for the benefit of our own State here. What difference does it make if one half of it goes to the treasury of our own State and the other half goes to supplement the reclamation fund of this great country of ours?

I understand that is a provision in the Ferris bill, which is now before the House as to the disposition of charges that will be made for waters on the public lands.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator is correct about that.

Mr. SHIELDS. Now, Mr. President, the Senator has said that it would not be fair for the streams in the East, those not upon the public lands, to be developed by the riparian owners without charge for the water as proposed by his amendment, because the developers of water power on the public lands would be subject to charges under the Ferris bill. I am not here advocating charges under the Ferris bill. I have never yet made up my mind to support it. The laws concerning the public lands and the proper management of them is a subject with which I am not familiar, to which I must give more attention, and which I must understand better before I vote either for or against the provisions of the Ferris bill. I have on all questions concerning the public lands been largely controlled by the judgment of the very able Senators and lawyers who represent the public-land States. But I do not approve the policy of Congress concerning the public domain in those States. It in effect denies to them the rights of sovereign States upon an equal footing with the original thirteen States and those east of the Mississippi River.

I would now support a bill that would cede to the public-land States every acre of territory within their respective boundaries, for I believe that the people of those States understand the situation better and are more able with their knowledge of conditions there to take care of those lands and to administer them economically for their benefit than Congress or bureaus here in Washington 3,000 miles away. Certainly, if those States are to be put upon an equal footing with the original States, they ought to have these lands for their own use. I do not see that the Eastern States have any real interest in them or any right to the proceeds of them.

I understand that the proceeds of the sales of the public lands are put into the reclamation fund. Am I correct about that, I ask the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; they are covered into the reclamation fund, and they must be returned by the people who have land under the reclamation project, and, when fully returned, one-half of it goes to the State and one-half to the National Treasury.

Mr. SHIELDS. That, to some extent, gives to these States the benefit of property that ought to belong to them, but I still believe that they know better how to manage it in the interests of their people than bureaus here in Washington or Congress.

Speaking of what is fair between the Eastern States, where this bill, if it becomes a law, will largely apply, and the public-land States, I have this to say: I know of no Member of this body from the Eastern States who is advocating charges upon water power developed on public lands. The Senator from Montana is the only one so far whom I have heard advocating such charges. I can see nothing fair or just in the proposition, that because he wants to impose a certain tax upon his people he should also impose one upon those of the other parts of the country. If he wants what is fair, let there be no tax imposed by Congress upon water-power development anywhere.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. SHIELDS. I will yield in a minute to the Senator. First I yield to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am much obliged to the Senator for yielding to me for a moment. I wish to offer as an amendment to the bill, as an additional section, the river regulation bill, which I have been urging for some years.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I can not yield for that purpose. I thought the Senator was simply going to offer a bill without any remarks.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will offer the amendment to the bill without any remarks.

Mr. SMOOT. The rules do not allow it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUSTING in the chair). The Chair will state to the Senator from Nevada that there is an amendment pending.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I simply wish to suggest an amendment in order that it may go into the RECORD and be printed, that is all.

Mr. SMOOT. All I wanted to say is that under the rules of the body when a Senator is addressing the Senate the Chair is instructed to state that it is out of order and the matter can not be presented.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Do I understand that under that rule a Senator can not yield the floor for a moment even?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly, if he yields the floor altogether.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then if he yields it can be done?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. My recollection is that it is the duty of the Chair to refuse to allow a Senator occupying the floor to yield unless he also yields the floor permanently. I would be glad to accommodate the Senator from Nevada but I can not.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am obliged to take a train in a few moments. I will not be back here until Monday. I shall ask the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to offer the amendment for me.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have been very patient in conducting the bill and have yielded to almost every one, but I can not yield any more.

There is another answer to the position taken by the Senator from Montana in the matter of tolls, which seems to me to be conclusive. The United States owns the public lands, the proprietary interest in them, and has a perfect right to sell them, to dispose of them, in the language of the Constitution; and I apprehend that in the greater right to sell is included the right to lease, and if it has the right to lease of course it has the right to charge rent. I have not investigated that question fully. It is not one that is germane to this bill, in my opinion, but I would say that it is a sound proposition.

In this case the United States has no proprietary interest. It has nothing to rent, nothing to lease, and nothing to sell. The cases are entirely different. There is no analogy; there is no parallel between them.

It is said that Congress could impose conditions when granting permits to riparian proprietors. Certainly Congress has the unlimited power over navigable streams, and it can arbitrarily declare that no structure of any kind shall be placed in a stream without its consent. Such are the provisions of the act of 1899, and it is only on account of that act that it is necessary to have the present legislation. For a hundred years previous to that act dams were built in navigable streams without the consent of Congress, and were only liable to be removed if they constituted obstructions to navigation. But this power was intended solely for the protection of navigation. It was never intended that Congress should exercise it to prohibit riparians from using their property in a lawful manner unless they should pay a tax not exacted from others for permission to use their property.

Congress can impose such conditions, but it would be an indefensible abuse of its power.

Mr. President, it is conceded, I think, by everyone that charges which may be imposed by this amendment will be an additional burden upon the consumer. The object of the bill is the development of the water power of the country. It is for the purpose of furnishing cheap power to the people, and especially to the people who reside within transmission distance of these great natural resources, and who, on account of their location, are entitled to the benefits of them. It would be as just to levy a tax on steam power as to levy one on water power. Certainly it will be a discrimination, unfair and unjust, to levy a tax upon one and not on the other.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, since 1908 there has practically been an embargo upon the construction of dams over navigable waters in this country. Improvements have gone on where the right to build the dam had been acquired before that time, but President Roosevelt on the 18th of March, 1908, sent a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, Senator Frye, stating that he would veto any water-power bill unless first it contained a limitation as to time; that is, that some definite time should be fixed, and in the next place unless it provided for the payment of a royalty or toll to the Government of the United States.

The Committee on Commerce of the Senate at that time had before it what was known as the James River Dam bill, providing for building a dam across the James River, in Stone County, Mo. After the committee received that letter from President Roosevelt it proceeded to consider the entire question, and the committee came to the unanimous conclusion that the assumption of President Roosevelt that the public should pay a royalty for the use of the water was unfounded and contrary to law. The Committee on Commerce reported the James River Dam bill unanimously without injecting into it the amendment that President Roosevelt insisted upon in his letter.

The bill went to the House and there it was hung up, and from that day to this, with the exception of the Rainy River bill, which was referred to the other day, no bill authorizing the construction of a dam over navigable waters has been passed. If my recollection serves me correctly, we have passed several bills here in the Senate; but those bills have been held up in the other House on the theory and contention that no right should be granted under special laws, that what we needed was a general law.

There has been such an embargo, Mr. President, that it has operated as an actual stay on water-power construction. Two years ago a prominent engineer, a native of my State, who had charge of the construction of the great Keokuk Dam in the Mississippi River, came to me and asked me to give him a letter of introduction to certain people in South America. He said he was going there. I asked him, "Why are you going there? Can you find nothing to do here in your line?" He was a great hydraulic engineer, one of the most eminent. He said, "No; everything is at a standstill here. I want something to do in the line of my profession. If I can not get it in this country, I have to go to South America."

This embargo has existed during all these years, and we are confronted now with the question whether we shall be able to pass a general water-power bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I read in the morning papers a few days ago that a prominent gentleman here in the city who has been identified with what is commonly known as conservation for a good many years, and is perhaps its most prominent proponent, has recently written a letter to the President of the United States bitterly attacking the pending bill because of its assumed one-sidedness in favor of would-be investors, and urging the President to veto the bill if it should pass the two Houses of Congress. I have no personal knowledge of the authenticity of that statement, but, assuming that there is some basis for it, I would like to ask the Senator from Minnesota whether, if this bill passes the Senate, it is not probable that with that opposition it will also be hung up in the other House. The gentleman to whom I refer is Mr. Gifford Pinchot.

Mr. NELSON. I have no means of stating what the House is likely to do.

Mr. THOMAS. Except as to its action in the past on similar bills.

Mr. NELSON. I hope we live in an age of progression. It is a remarkable fact that when President Taft was Secretary of War—and the records show it—he entirely agreed with the report of the Committee on Commerce made upon the James River dam bill. It was President Taft's opinion that the Federal Government, except for purposes of navigation, has no property in the navigable waters of the United States. That was his opinion as Secretary of War, and when he became President, because he got a so-called reform Secretary of War during the last part of his administration, who insisted on taking a different view, and writing a veto message, as the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] said the other day, he acquiesced; he did not want to have any quarrel with his Secretary of War.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NELSON. Let me go on and discuss this a little further and then I will yield for questions.

Mr. WALSH. May I take just a minute?

Mr. NELSON. I did not interrupt the Senator when he was talking. I will yield to questions by and by.

Mr. WALSH. I want to ask the Senator a question at this point.

Mr. NELSON. Well, what is the question?

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Colorado referred to the opposition of Mr. Pinchot to this bill. I observe that Mr. Pinchot included in his denunciation the other bill as well. I want to inquire of the Senator from Minnesota whether it is not his opinion that it would be advisable to steer some medium course, if we could find it, and whether he feels that the other House is any more acquiescent at the present time than it has been in the past?

Mr. NELSON. I do not believe in anything of that kind. The country has been suffering under the sinister influence that was originated by the gentleman the Senator from Colorado referred to. I hope we have got beyond that. I hope we have got beyond allowing an outsider at the head of a reform bureau to dictate to Congress and to the President of the United States what ought to be done for the public welfare.

Mr. WALSH. I was simply asking the question whether in the light——

Mr. NELSON. I want to ask a question of the Senator. Does he propose to allow such a gentleman to tell him what to do or what not to do in reference to public legislation?

Mr. WALSH. I am sure the Senator from Minnesota well knows that I do not propose to do anything of the kind.

Mr. NELSON. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. WALSH. I propose to proceed, as a matter of course, on my own judgment of what ought to be done. I simply rose in perfect good faith, however, to ask the Senator in the light of his large experience in these matters whether he believes that the temper of the other House is such——

Mr. NELSON. Yes; I have every hope in the other House, especially now since the margin between the Democrats and Republicans is less than it was before.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, in answer to the question the Senator from Montana asked——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. SHIELDS. With the consent of the Senator from Minnesota, I wish to further suggest that this bill will have just as good a show in the other House as the House bill will have in this Chamber; and if this Chamber favors this bill, if it favors the principle involved in it——

Mr. NELSON. That is what I am afraid of—that we shall fall between two stools.

Mr. SHIELDS. If Congress does not pass this bill, Mr. President, it would be useless to pass another one similar to the one now upon the statute books. That has proved not only to be a failure to provide a method of developing these powers but it has proved absolutely prohibitory. If we can pass a bill only containing the same prohibitory provisions, we had better let the entire matter drop and consume no further time on it.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I not only indulge the hope that the other House will proceed to aid us in enacting the proper legislation to remove the embargo existing, but, while in all respects I have not as full confidence as I might have in the President of the United States, I have faith enough to believe that on this all-important question he will be ready to serve the welfare of the American people and will take a fair and liberal course. I hope that Senators—I say this to all who are present, and I should like to have more of them present—in view of what has transpired in the past eight years and of the condition of the question will aid the Committee on Commerce in securing the passage of this most necessary legislation.

I will now come to another question which the Senator from Colorado so ably discussed, and that is this: I start out with the principle—and I think it is clearly established by the decisions of the courts—that the Government of the United States has no property right in the navigable waters of the United States, except for purposes of navigation; that all other property in the navigable waters of the United States either belongs to the respective States or to the riparian owners, according to the local laws of the several States.

I thought—and I say it in the most friendly spirit—that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] was a little confusing in his argument in one respect. There are here three classes of dams, involving three classes of questions. Where the Government of the United States, for the purpose of improving navigation with its own money and its own property, acquiring first the riparian lands, erects a dam in the navigable waters of the United States, and, as an incident thereto, a surplus power for electrical purposes is created, the Government has the right to dispose of that surplus power. It has that right by virtue of the fact that it has been to the expense of constructing the dam not because of any property in the water in the river but because of the fact that it has been to that expense and has caused the building of the dam.

The Supreme Court of the United States has settled that question and decided that, if there is an incidental power created in connection with the construction of a dam by the Federal Government, the Government has a right to dispose of that power. The court decided that question, first, directly in the case of the Kaukauna Co. against Green Bay Canal, and later in the Sault Ste. Marie case. So that is a settled question.

The condition is entirely different, Mr. President, when you come to the construction of dams by private individuals. We, the Federal Government, can not convey the right to A, B, or C to construct a dam unless it is primarily for the purpose of navigation. When we do confer upon a given company, a State, or a municipality the right to construct a dam primarily for the purpose of navigation, and secondarily, or as an incident, for water-power purposes, we make the grantee the agent of the United States; we put him in exactly the same position, or we aim to put him in the same position, as the Government of the United States would be should it construct that dam.

In those cases where the Government does not invest a dollar in the enterprise, but where the dam is constructed by private capital, what has the Government to sell? Nothing but the water; and it has no right in that except for the purposes of navigation. Under those circumstances, if the dam does not interrupt navigation, if it turns out to be an aid and improvement to navigation by creating a navigable pool above the dam—if all that transpires—should that company or that individual or that municipality be charged for doing what it would primarily be the duty of the Government of the United States to do? In other words, if a given stream should be improved for purposes of navigation, or if it ought to be improved, the primary duty is upon the Government to do it; but if, instead of the Government doing it, it delegates that duty to a municipal corporation or to a public-utility corporation, then that corporation stands in the place of the Government and is performing a work and duty that properly belongs to the Government. Why, under those circumstances, where the Government is put to no expense, should the corporation be compelled to pay royalty for the use of the water? If that royalty is right, if you can charge it, the Government would have the right to go up into New Hampshire or into Maine, where anyone might build a dam, and say, "You must pay a royalty to the Government of the United States for the surplus power you have created in this stream." So I say there is an entire difference.

Mr. President, in a case where the Government erects a dam it is proper enough that the Government should charge for the incidental power and have the right to lease it; but its right to charge is based, not upon the fact that it has property in the water of the stream, but upon the fact that it has invested money, has expended capital there in building a dam and improving the navigation of the stream. So I thought, with all due respect, that the able Senator from Montana failed to properly discriminate between the two cases to which I have referred.

The Senator referred to the other water-power bill, which, I am sorry to say, I have not had time to examine, and of which I can only speak in a general way. That, as I understand, is a bill that aims to give the beneficiaries the right to construct a dam upon the public lands of the United States either in a forest reserve or on other public lands, the site of the dam to be constructed being where the Federal Government owns the land. Manifestly in that case, where the Government owns the site, where it owns the only available place in that section to build a dam, the Government should charge for disposing of that privilege, and for that privilege alone, but not for the use of the water.

Here is another thing, Mr. President, to which I desire to refer. I am not familiar with what the charges are in the bill which comes from the Public Lands Committee, but if the charges are excessive, if they are unreasonable, they become a burden upon the public and the consumer. Under the pending bill we aim, first, to allow the public, those who are described in the bill, to acquire the right to build dams. We make them amenable to public control as to the rates and charges. They are subject to the control of their respective States. As to the transmission of electrical power from one State to another, where it is in the nature of interstate commerce, the regulative power is left to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. President, while I am interested in the Federal Government, I am interested especially in the welfare of the consumers. The bigger the charge, the greater the amount of burden you place upon the water-power companies or grantees, the larger will be the burden upon the public. If people will go and develop those water powers—which, under the present system, instead of taking, as in olden times, a few hundred or a few thousand dollars, take millions of dollars—it is better to give the public the right to develop those powers and let the public have the benefit of them at the lowest possible price.

But, Mr. President, when I rose I did not intend to occupy the time of the Senate at any length on this subject. As a member of the committee, I have watched the course of this legislation for the last eight or nine years. It has seemed to me that we have done a great wrong and an injury to our country in stopping all water-power development, as we have done by failing to pass proper legislation. In this bill we aim to cover one branch of the case; by this general bill we aim to cover the ground, as you might say, in all the older States, in the States that are not public-land States, and to give a general opportunity for water-power development through the War Department.

As to the other bill, I wish to repeat to the Senator from Montana that I am not familiar with all of its details; but my disposition is to do whatever is for the benefit of the public in the Western States. Their welfare is near and dear to my heart, and I am not here merely for the purpose of piling up money in the coffers of Uncle Sam at the behest of some reformer.

I have aimed, Mr. President, in my legislative career to be immune from such sinister influences as public men sometimes encounter. I may have made mistakes, but, on the whole, I have preferred to look after the welfare of the people of the United States rather than the political welfare of some outsider who has a hobby or some new gospel that he wants to ventilate.

I hope every Senator here will do his best to cooperate with us in the passage of this most important bill. It is far more important than many Senators suppose. It is important to open wide the door to secure the necessary water-power development. Indeed, it is perhaps more needed in the Southern States than it is needed in the Northern States, and, Senators, my heart goes out in response to any measure to promote the welfare of the Southern States. They had a hard, trying time during the Civil War and during the reconstruction period. I have often thought of the poor Confederate soldiers after Lee's surrender and of the adverse conditions they had to face when they returned to their dismantled and ruined homes, without means to begin the work of reconstruction of their shattered fortunes, and I have always admired them for their courage, their patience, and their fortitude.

The Union soldiers, when the war was over, could go back to good homes and be received with open arms, but the poor Confederate soldier entered, as it were, upon a desert; he had to begin life de novo and under the most adverse conditions. So, Mr. President, I have always been in favor, in connection with river and harbor improvements and in connection with whatever was for the welfare of the Southern States, of helping them, because I knew they needed the help.

Some have said that the road bill is simply for the Southern States. Well, suppose it is. I know they need roads in that yellow-clay country of theirs. Some have said, "You must not expend too much money on the rivers in that section." Why, Mr. President, I spent a good part of my career as a soldier in Louisiana, and since I came to the Senate there has hardly been a creek or bayou in Louisiana for which I have not felt like voting an appropriation.

Senators, I ask every one of you to join us in helping to pass this most important piece of legislation, which, above all other legislation for the welfare of our country, is needed at the present juncture.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I agree, upon the whole, with everything the Senator from Minnesota has said. By the way, it seems a strange fatality that a Mississippian and a Norwegian should agree with one another, but I generally do agree with almost everything the Senator says. I want to ask the Senator this question: Does he remember a single instance in the history of the United States when the people of a State, the American people of a State, were any more untrue to their obligations than the American people of the United States in connection with mere material and financial questions? Does he not think that the regularly organized authorities of a State, who are the representatives of the American people within their bailiwicks, are as well to be trusted as are the Representatives and Senators in the United States Congress, and has he ever found at any time that they were not as trustworthy as we are?

Mr. NELSON. As a general proposition, I agree with the Senator, and I may further say that this bill is founded on that principle. We propose to leave to the several States the regulation of the charges for electric power generated by the dams to be erected. It is only when the power enters into interstate commerce that it becomes subject to regulation by the Federal Government under the commerce clause of the Constitution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Only in that case and when it affects the question of the navigability of a stream.

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Has the Federal Government any right to interfere except upon one or the other of those two grounds?

Mr. NELSON. My theory is, and I have stated it, though I do not think the Senator was present at the time——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I heard the Senator state it, but I wanted to emphasize it by asking him the question and receiving his answer. I take it for granted that the Senator's answer is that the General Government has no right to interfere any further than to control the navigability of the stream and to regulate interstate commerce; and this bill, according to my understanding, neither injuriously affects interstate commerce nor the navigability of streams——

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is intended to benefit both.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But merely emphasizes the rights originally left to the States.

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wanted merely to get the Senator's approval of that statement.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the report of the Senate Committee on Commerce, submitted April 30, 1908, on the bill to construct a dam across the James River in Stone County, Mo., be printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report referred to is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 585, Sixtieth Congress, first session.]

DAM ACROSS JAMES RIVER IN STONE COUNTY, MO.

Mr. NELSON, from the Comittee on Commerce, submitted the following report [to accompany H. R. 17707]:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 17707) to authorize William H. Standish to construct a dam across James River, in Stone County, Mo., and divert a portion of its waters through a tunnel into the said river again to create electric power, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass without amendment.

Following is a copy of the House report on the bill:

[House Report No. 1256, Sixtieth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 17707) to authorize William H. Standish to construct a dam across James River, in Stone County, Mo., and divert a portion of its waters through a tunnel into the said river again to create electric power, having considered the same, report thereon with amendments, and as so amended recommend that it pass.

The bill as amended has the approval of the War Department, as will appear by the indorsements attached and made a part of this report.

Amend the bill as follows:

In line 3, page 1, after the word "that," insert "the consent of Congress is hereby given to."

In lines 4 and 5, page 1, strike out "be, and they are hereby, authorized."

In lines 9 and 10, page 1, strike out "that at the narrows in said bend he and they are hereby authorized," and in line 10, page 1, after the word "impound," insert "at the narrows in said bend."

At the end of section 1 add the following:

"Provided, That the Secretary of War shall have at all times control of the use of the water, even to the extent of causing the persons, firms, or corporations taking advantage of the privileges granted herein, to cease using the water whenever the same may be necessary for navigation: And provided further, That should the United States in the work of improving the aforesaid river find it necessary to flood the aforesaid tunnels or in any way affect the flow of water through them, the owners or operators of aforesaid tunnels shall have no claim against the United States for damage on account of said flooding of the tunnels or said effect on the flow of water through them."

Strike out all of section 2 and renumber section 3 to section 2.

[Second indorsement.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, March 11, 1908.

Respectfully returned to the Secretary of War with recommendation that the accompanying bill (H. R. 17707, 60th Cong., 1st sess.) to authorize the construction of a dam across James River, in Stone County, Mo., and to divert a portion of its waters through a channel into the said river again to create electric power, be amended as indicated in red thereon.

As thus amended I am of opinion that the bill makes ample provision for the protection of navigation interests, and I know of no objection to its favorable consideration by Congress so far as those interests are concerned.

SMITH S. LEACH,
Acting Chief of Engineers.

[Third indorsement.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 12, 1908.

Respectfully returned to the chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, House of Representatives, inviting attention to the foregoing report of the Acting Chief of Engineers, United States Army, and to the accompanying copy of amended bill referred to.

ROBERT SHAW OLIVER,
Assistant Secretary of War.

Following is a copy of a letter of the President received after the bill was referred to this committee:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, March 13, 1908.

SIR: Numerous bills granting water rights in conformity with the general act of June 21, 1906, have been introduced during the present session of Congress, and some of these have already passed. While the general act authorizes the limitation and restriction of water rights in the public interest, and would seem to warrant making a reasonable charge for the benefits conferred, those bills which have come to my attention do not seem to guard the public interests adequately in these respects. The effect of granting privileges such as are conferred by these bills, as I said in a recent message, "taken together with rights already acquired under State laws, would be to give away properties of enormous value. Through lack of foresight we have formed the habit of granting without compensation extremely valuable rights, amounting to monopolies, on navigable streams and on the public domain. The repurchase at great expense of water rights thus carelessly given away without return has already begun in the East, and before long it will be necessary in the West also. No rights involving water power should be granted to any corporation in perpetuity, but only for a length of time sufficient to allow them to conduct their business profitably. A reasonable charge should, of course, be made for valuable rights and privileges which they obtain from the National Government. The values for which this charge is made will ultimately, through the natural growth and orderly development of our population and industries, reach enormous amounts. A fair share of the increase should be safe-guarded for the benefit of the people, from whose labor it springs. The proceeds thus secured, after the cost of administration and improvement has been met, should naturally be devoted to the development of our inland waterways." Accordingly, I have decided to sign no bills hereafter which do not provide specifically for the right to fix and make a charge and for a definite limitation in time of the rights conferred.

Sincerely, yours, THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE,
Chairman Committee on Commerce, United States Senate.

The bill, together with the foregoing letter, was referred to the War Department for its views, which are presented in the following indorsements:

[Second indorsement.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, April 11, 1908.

1. Respectfully returned to the Secretary of War.

2. The Committee on Commerce of the United States Senate refers H. R. 17707, Sixtieth Congress, first session, being a bill to authorize William H. Standish to construct a dam across the James River, Mo., and "to divert a portion of its waters through a tunnel into the said river again, to create electric power."

3. This bill was referred to this department for report during its consideration in the House of Representatives, and, after the usual inquiry through the local engineer officer, was reported on on March 11, 1908, to the effect that, so far as the interests of navigation are concerned, there is no objection to its passage.

4. Subsequently, March 18, 1908, the President of the United States, in a letter to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce, stated that all bills of this character not having provision for a limited life and a remuneration to the United States for the privileges or rights conveyed will fail to receive Executive approval. The Senate Committee on Commerce now desires the opinion of the War Department upon the merits of the bill and the properiety of its passage, "in view of the letter of the President to the chairman of the committee."

5. The Chief of Engineers notes that the bill (H. R. 17707) as it now stands does not comply with either of the President's requirements, and it is not believed that such requirements are provided for in the general dam act of June 2, 1906.

6. The following provision, if inserted in H. R. 17707, after the words "nineteen hundred and six," line 6, page 2, will, it is believed, accomplish the objects aimed at: "and the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War shall, in accordance with said act, and as a part of the conditions and stipulations provided for therein, fix such limitation of time for the privilege hereby permitted, and such charge or charges for the same as they may deem necessary to protect the present or future interests of the United States."

The details as to time and amount in each case will depend upon the facts in each case, including amount of investment relative to the interests of navigation, and the amount of future responsibility which may have to be assumed by the Government in the matter of proper maintenance of dams, operation of locks, and other items, including possible failure of grantee, which may bear upon any liabilities which the Government by chance might possibly be called upon to assume. While in the form of legislation suggested no definite time or amount is considered, it is appreciated that in each case such time and amount would require consideration by the grantor in advance of preliminary work by the grantee.

A. MACKENZIE,
Brigadier General, Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

[Third indorsement.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 14, 1908.

Respectfully returned to the chairman Committee on Commerce, United States Senate, concurring in the foregoing views of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

ROBERT SHAW OLIVER,
Assistant Secretary of War.

Following is the amendment suggested by the War Department:

Insert, on page 2, line 6, after the word "six," the following: "and the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War shall, in accordance with the terms of said act, impose conditions and stipulations fixing such limitation of time for the privilege hereby permitted and such charge or charges for the same as they may deem necessary to protect the present or future interests of the United States."

The President, in a communication addressed to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce, dated March 18 last, as well as in his veto message of April 17, relating to the bill (H. R. 15444) to extend the time for the construction of a dam across Rainy River, has declared it to be his policy not to approve of any bill permitting the construction of a dam by private parties across a navigable stream, although due provision is made for the conservation of the stream for the purposes of navigation, unless the bill provides for the payment of a royalty or compensation to the United States for the use of the water of the stream for purposes other than navigation.

This is a new departure from the policy heretofore pursued in respect to legislation authorizing the construction of such dams, and in view of this fact it becomes important to inquire whether the Government of the United States has the right to require compensation for the use of water in such streams for purposes other than navigation.

The common-law doctrine of England that a stream is not deemed to be a navigable watercourse unless the tide ebbs and flows in it is not the law in this country. The question whether a watercourse is a navigable stream is one of fact. If it is capable of being used for the purposes of trade and commerce in any mode, even for floating rafts of logs and timber, it is deemed to be a navigable stream. (The Montello, 20 Wall., 430; St. Anthony Water Power Co. v. St. Paul Water Commissioners, 168 U. S., 349.)

The title to the water of a navigable stream within the borders of a State is not in the Federal Government, but in the State; and title to the banks and bed of the stream, after the Federal Government has parted with its riparian lands, is either in the State or in the riparian owner, or both, according to the laws of the respective States. These principles have been laid down and applied by the Supreme Court of the United States in the following, among other, cases, and is the settled law of the land, to wit: Martin v. Waddell (16 Pet., 367); Pollard v. Hagan (3 How., 212); Goodtitle v. Kibbe (9 How., 471); Barney v. Keokuk (94 U. S., 324); St. Louis v. Myers (113 U. S., 566); Packer v. Bird (137 U. S., 661); Hadrin v. Jordan (140 U. S., 371); Kaukauna Water Power Co. v. Green Bay & Mississippi Canal Co. (142 U. S., 254); Shively v. Bowlby (152 U. S., 1); Water Power Co. v. Water Commissioners (168 U. S., 349); Kean v. Calumet Canal Co. (190 U. S., 452); United States v. The Chandler Dunbar Water Power Co. (U. S. Supreme Court, Apr. 20, 1908).

The use of water in such a stream is a matter of State regulation and State control. In many of the States the common-law rule, as defined in the following language of Chancellor Kent, prevails, to wit:

"Every proprietor of lands on the banks of a river has naturally an equal right to the use of the water which flows in the stream adjacent to his lands, as it was wont to run (currere solebat) without diminution or alteration. No proprietor has a right to use the water to the prejudice of other proprietors above or below him unless he has a prior right to divert it, or a title to some exclusive enjoyment. He has no property in the water itself, but a simple usufruct while it passes along. Aqua currit et debet currere ut currere solebat is the language of the law. Though he may use the water while it runs over his land as an incident to the land, he can not unreasonably detain it or give it another direction, and he must return it to its ordinary channel when it leaves his estate."

In the mining and arid States the rule of prior appropriation for mining and irrigation purposes prevails, and this rule of the States has been recognized by Federal statutes (R. S., secs. 2339-2340). In some of the States there is a mixed application, as in California, of the common-law rule and the rule of prior appropriation.

But whatever rule may prevail in any State as to the use of the water in a stream, it is always subject to the following limitations, laid down by the Supreme Court in the case of the United States v. Rio Grande Dam & Irrigation Co. (174 U. S., 690):

"Although this power of changing the common-law rule as to streams within its dominion undoubtedly belongs to each State, yet two limitations must be recognized: First, that in the absence of specific authority from Congress a State can not by its legislation destroy the right of the United States, as the owner of lands bordering on a stream, to the continued flow of its water; so far at least as may be necessary for the beneficial uses of the Government property. Second, that it is limited by the superior power of the General Government to secure the uninterrupted navigability of all navigable streams within the limits of the United States. In other words, the jurisdiction of the General Government over interstate commerce and its natural highways vests in that Government the right to take all needed measures to preserve the navigability of the navigable watercourses of the country even against any State action."

Where the Federal Government is not interested as the owner of riparian lands, the only interest it has in the water of a stream is as to its use for purposes of navigation, and it can lay no claim to the use of the water for any other purpose, not even for irrigation. (Kansas v. Colorado, 206 U. S., 46.)

In this case the United States appeared as intervener, but inasmuch as it founded its claim not on the question of navigation, but on the question of irrigation, the court held that it had no ground for intervention, and dismissed its petition. In reference to this subject the court says:

"It follows from this that if in the present case the National Government was asserting as against either Kansas or Colorado, that the appropriation for the purposes of irrigation of the waters of the Arkansas was affecting the navigability of the stream, it would become our duty to determine the truth of the charge. But the Government makes no such contention. On the contrary, it distinctly asserts that the Arkansas River is not now and never was practically navigable beyond Fort Gibson, in the Indian Territory, and nowhere claims that any appropriation of the waters by Kansas or Colorado affects its navigability.

"It rested its petition of intervention upon its alleged duty of legislating for the reclamation of arid lands. * * *

"Turning to the enumeration of the powers granted to Congress by the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, it is enough to say that no one of them by any implication refers to the reclamation of arid lands. * * *

"While arid lands are to be found mainly, if not only, in the Western and newer States, yet the powers of the National Government within the limits of those States are the same (no greater and no less) than those within the limits of the original thirteen, and it would be strange if, in the absence of a definite grant of power, the National Government could enter the territory of the States along the Atlantic and legislate in respect to improving by irrigation or otherwise the lands within their borders. Nor do we understand that hitherto Congress has acted in disregard to this limitation."

It was the doctrine at common law that a grant of land upon the borders of a navigable stream carried the grant only to high-water mark, while a grant of land bordering upon a nonnavigable stream carried the ownership to the center or thread of the stream, subject to the public easement.

In the case of Hardin v. Jordan (140 U. S., 384) the Supreme Court states:

"The United States have not repealed the common law as to the interpretation of their own grants, nor explained what interpretation or limitation should be given to or imposed upon the terms of the ordinary conveyances which they use, except in a few special instances; but these are left to the principles of law and rules adopted by each local government where the land may lie. We have adopted the common law, and must, therefore, apply its principles to the interpretation of their grant."

Further on the court states the same principle in this form:

"In our judgment the grants of the Government for lands bounded on streams and other waters without any reservation or limitation of terms are to be construed as to their effect according to the laws of the State in which the lands lie."

The rule of riparian ownership as to grants of land bordering on a navigable stream is diverse in the various States. Some States hold that the grant extends only to high-water mark; other States hold that it extends to low-water mark, while another class of States—and perhaps the most numerous—hold that the grant extends to the middle of the stream, subject to the public easement in the water of the stream. But whatever may be the law in this respect as to the effect of the grant, it only relates to the proprietorship in the banks and bed of the stream and not to the ownership of the water in the stream.

In those States which hold that the title of the riparian owner only extends to the high or low water mark the title to the bed of the stream is deemed to be in the State; and whether the title to the bed of the stream is in the riparian owner or in the State, in either case the general title to the water of the stream is deemed to be in the State, but it holds it not absolutely but in trust for all lawful public uses. The State's interest in such a stream is akin to that of a riparian owner, though more comprehensive and general in its nature, and does not exist in hostility to or in diminution of the rights of the riparian owner. (Rossmiller v. State, 114 Wis., 169; Peoples Ice Co. v. Davenport, 149 Mass., 322; Brown v. Cunningham, 82 Iowa, 512; Braston v. Rockport Ice Co., 77 Maine, 100; Martin et al. v. Waddell, 16 Peters, 367.)

From the foregoing it will appear that there are three different parties who are interested in the waters of a navigable stream:

1. The United States.
2. The State in which the stream is located.
3. The riparian owner.

The interest of the United States is derived from and rests upon that paragraph of the Constitution which gives Congress the power to regulate interstate commerce, and this power only extends to the extent of conserving the navigability of the stream. Beyond that the Federal Government has no interest or property in the stream.

The interest of the State in the stream is derived from its sovereignty, and it holds its property in the stream in trust for all public uses, but in subrogation to the rights of the Federal Government as to navigation and of the riparian owner. The right to the use of the waters of a stream for any lawful purpose, outside of the right of navigation, belongs wholly to the State and the riparian owner. (Martin et al. v. Waddell, 16 Peters, 367.)

Chief Justice Shaw, in the case of Elliott v. Fitchburg Railroad Co. (10 Cushing, 191), describes the rights of the riparian owner in the use of water in a stream in the following language, which states the enlarged and modified common-law doctrine:

"The right to flowing water is now well settled to be a right incident to property in the land; it is a right publici juris, of such a character that, while it is common and equal to all through whose land it runs, and no one can obstruct or divert it, yet, as one of the beneficial gifts of Providence, each proprietor has a right to a just and reasonable use of it as it passes through his land; and so long as it is not wholly obstructed or diverted, or no larger appropriation of the water running through it is made than a just and reasonable use, it can not be said to be wrongful or injurious to a proprietor lower down. What is such a just and reasonable use may often be a difficult question, depending upon various circumstances. To take a quantity of water from a large running stream for agricultural or manufacturing purposes would cause no sensible or practicable diminution of the benefit, to the prejudice of a lower proprietor; whereas taking the same quantity from a small running brook passing through many farms would be of great and manifest injury to those below, who need it for domestic supply or watering cattle; and, therefore, it would be an unreasonable use of the water, and an action would lie in the latter case and not in the former. It is therefore to a considerable extent a question of degree; still the rule is the same, that each proprietor has a right to a reasonable use of it, for his own benefit, for domestic use, and for manufacturing and agricultural purposes. * * *

"That a portion of the water of a stream may be used for the purpose of irrigating land we think is well established as one of the rights of the proprietors of the soil along or through which it passes. Yet a proprietor can not under color of that right or for the actual purpose of irrigating his own land wholly abstract or divert the water course or take such an unreasonable quantity of water or make such unreasonable use of it as to deprive other proprietors of the substantial benefits which they might derive from it if not diverted or used unreasonably. * * *

"This rule, that no riparian proprietor can wholly abstract or divert a water course, by which it would cease to be a running stream, or use it unreasonably in its passage and thereby deprive a lower proprietor of a quality of his property, deemed in law incidental and beneficial, necessarily flows from the principle that the right to the reasonable and beneficial use of a running stream is common to all the riparian proprietors, and so each is bound to use his common right as not essentially to prevent or interfere with an equally beneficial enjoyment of the common right by all the proprietors. * * *

"The right to the use of flowing water is publici juris, and common to all the riparian proprietors; it is not an absolute and exclusive right to all the water flowing past their land, so that any obstruction would give a cause of action; but it is a right to the flow and enjoyment of the water, subject to a similar right in all the proprietors to the reasonable enjoyment of the same gift of Providence. It is, therefore, only for an abstraction and deprivation of this common benefit or for an unreasonable and unauthorized use of it that an action will lie."

The doctrine of prior appropriation, already referred to, is thus described by Justice Field in the case of Jennison v. Kirk (98 U. S., 453). After describing the system of discovery and appropriation and development of mining claims, he adds the following:

"But the mines could not be worked without water. Without water the gold would remain forever buried in the earth or rock. To carry water to mining localities when they were not on the bank of a stream or lake became, therefore, an important and necessary business in carrying on mining. Here, also, the first appropriator of water to be conveyed to such locality for mining or other beneficial purposes was recognized as having, to the extent of actual use, the better right. The doctrine of the common law respecting the right of riparian owners was not considered as applicable, or only in a very limited degree, to the conditions of miners in the mountains. The waters of rivers and lakes were, consequently, carried great distances in ditches and flumes, constructed with vast labor and enormous expenditures of money, along the sides of mountains and through canyons and ravines, to supply communities engaged in mining as well as for agriculturists and ordinary consumption. Numerous regulations were adopted, or assumed to exist, from their obvious justness, for the security of these ditches and flumes and for the protection of rights to water, not only between different appropriators, but between them and the holders of mining claims. These regulations and customs were appealed to in controversies in the State courts and received their sanction, and properties to the value of many millions rested upon them. For 18 years, from 1848 to 1866, the regulations and customs of miners, as enforced and molded by the courts and sanctioned by the legislation of the State, constituted the law governing property in mines and in water on the public mineral lands."

These water rights, by prior appropriation, as described by Justice Field, was recognized and confirmed by congressional legislation in 1866 and in 1870. Those acts are now sections 2339 and 2340 of the Revised Statutes. Justice Field further adds:

"It will thus be seen that the Federal statutes merely gave a formal sanction to the rules already established. Those rules had been built up in reliance on the tacit acquiescence of the United States, the true owner of the lands and waters on which appropriations were made, and these statutes acquiesced therein expressly 'a voluntary recognition of a preexisting right rather than the establishment of a new one.'"

In the case of Broder v. Natoma Water Co. (101 U. S., 274), the Supreme Court, in referring to the contention that these statutes established a new right, uses the following language:

"We are of the opinion that it is the established doctrine of this court that rights of miners, who had taken possession of mines and worked and developed them, and the rights of persons who had constructed canals and ditches to be used in mining operations and for purposes of agricultural irrigation, in the region where such artificial use of the water was an absolute necessity, are rights which the Government had, by its conduct, recognized and encouraged and was bound to protect before the passage of the act of 1866, and that the section of the act which we have quoted was rather a voluntary recognition of a preexisting right of possession, constituting a valid claim to its continued use, than the establishment of a new one."

These decisions of Judge Shaw, of Massachusetts, and of Justice Field, of the Supreme Court, describe fully the rights of the riparian owners to the use of the water both under the doctrine of the common law and under the so-called doctrine of prior appropriation, and the case of Rossmiller v. The State (114 Wis., 169), and the cases therein referred to, as well as the case of Martin et al. v. Waddell (16 Peters, 367), show the interest and property of a State in the waters of a stream.

From the foregoing statement and citation of authorities it is evident that the only use of the waters of a stream in which the United States has any property is its use for purposes of navigation. In the use of the stream for any other purpose the Federal Government has no property and hence has nothing to sell or to exact compensation for.

The plan proposed by the President would deprive the States and the riparian owners of their rights in the use of the water of a navigable stream now vested in them by law and would concentrate the entire disposal and control in the Federal Government, a power which neither the States nor the riparian owners can, with justice or safety, for a moment concede. But assuming for the sake of the argument that the Federal Government can lay a tribute in such cases as is proposed by the President, it can not be under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, but must be under section 8 of article 1, which reads as follows:

"SEC. 8. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."

Such a tribute must be either a direct tax or in the nature of an impost or excise tax. If a direct tax, it can not be levied directly by the Federal Government, but must be apportioned among the States, leaving each State to make the collection; and if an impost or excise tax, then it must be levied by the rule of uniformity upon every dam and water power in the United States not constructed directly or indirectly by the Federal Government. In other words, there must be a general excise law on the subject. The power of the Federal Government over the navigable streams of the country is no greater in the so-called Western or public-land States than in the New England States. If a tribute can be levied on a dam and water power in Minnesota or Colorado it can be levied on a dam and water power in Maine or Massachusetts, for the power of the Federal Government over navigable streams is the same in the one case as in the other. In the case of Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (157 U. S., 557) the court states:

"Thus in the matter of taxation the Constitution recognizes the two great classes of direct and indirect taxes and lays down two rules by which their imposition must be governed, namely, the rule of apportionment as to direct taxes and the rule of uniformity as to duties, imposts, and excises."

In the case of Thomas v. United States (192 U. S., 363), Chief Justice Fuller says:

"And these two classes, taxes so called, and 'duties, imposts, and excises,' apparently embrace all forms of taxation contemplated by the Constitution. As was observed in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (157 U. S., 557), 'Although there have been from time to time intimations that there might be some tax which was not a direct tax nor included under the words "duties, imposts, and excises," such a tax for more than 100 years of national existence has as yet remained undiscovered, notwithstanding the stress of particular circumstances has invited thorough investigation into sources of revenue. * * *'

"There is no occasion to attempt to confine the words 'duties, imposts, and excises' to the limits of precise definition. We think that they were used comprehensively to cover customs and excise duties imposed on importation, consumption, manufacture, and sale of certain commodities, privileges, particular business transactions, vocations, occupations, and the like."

An act authorizing the construction of a dam is, so far as the United States is concerned, a mere revocable license or privilege, and if a tax can be imposed on such a privilege it must be general and uniform throughout the United States. It must apply to all dams and water powers on navigable streams throughout the entire country.

Nearly all navigable streams in their upper and more remote courses are not, as a matter of fact, navigable, and in such reaches of the river dams can be erected and water powers created under State authority and State license, and so long as such dams and water powers do not materially injure or diminish the navigability of the stream in its navigable portions the Federal Government has no ground for interference. It has been customary, however, in many of such cases to apply to Congress for a Federal license and the granting of it, while not necessary, serves a twofold purpose: First, that it authorizes the Federal Government, through the War Department, to control and direct the construction of the dam; and, second, that it recognizes the fact, which might otherwise require proof, that the dam will not affect the navigability of the stream in its navigable portions. (Kansas v. Colorado, 206 U. S., 46; United States v. Rio Grande Co., 174 U. S., 690.)

And in such cases it is of as much advantage to the United States as to the grantee of the license to have congressional action and recognition, but in such cases the Federal Government has nothing to sell, and therefore has no moral or legal ground to demand compensation in any form.

For reasons above given the committee report the bill without the amendment recommended by the War Department.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Montana, I desire to submit a concrete proposition to him and get his views upon it. In my State on the Coosa River, which is navigable at both ends, but locked up in the middle where it breaks through the mountains and where shoals and rapids are created, a private corporation has built a dam, after having filed with the Secretary of War their plans for his approval. It was built under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of War, and they agreed that when the river became navigable by other improvements they would put into that dam a lock for commercial purposes. All of this having been done at their own expense and at a cost of $2,000,000 they now turn the whole structure over to the Government of the United States for its uses and purposes. Does the Senator think that they ought to be required to pay a tax or toll?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator has propounded that inquiry. I should say to the Senator from Alabama that it would appear as though the United States had secured by that kind of a contract entirely adequate compensation for the privilege extended. I should say that no tax and no royalty in addition ought to be exacted; but I can easily suppose that a dam would be built under this bill where no such conditions would exist at all nor need exist.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, if it were built by private parties it would be in exactly the same circumstances.

Mr. WALSH. Not at all. There is nothing in this bill that would impose such an obligation as that upon the contractor or permittee. Under this bill the dam might be built in a navigable stream, without any provisions for navigation at all, and without any provisions that the Government might take it over for its own purposes at all. I want to give the Secretary of War power to make this charge when the conditions will justify the imposition of the charge and to withhold it where the conditions do not justify its imposition.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana says that it may be possible, as I understand him, that a permit may be granted without a lock being required and without facilities for navigation being afforded.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think, on reflection, the Senator can not give that construction to this bill. It is limited to navigable rivers. Dams can not be placed in navigable rivers without obstructing navigation, unless there are placed in them locks and other facilities for vessels to pass from the pools above to the pools below.

Again, dams can not under any circumstances be built without the plans and specifications being first submitted to the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers; and they are required to impose such conditions as will protect the present and future navigation facilities of the river. Mr. President, I think Congress can well rely upon the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers in all cases to give the United States the benefit of all doubt, and that they will do so in all cases. What I fear is that they will, in their anxiety to protect navigation, in some cases require the construction of dams of such a character as will impose a hardship upon the company proposing to make the development. The Chief of Engineers and his corps have the navigation of rivers in mind; they are protecting that interest; it is their primary duty to protect it; and in all cases, under the provisions of this bill, we can expect them to give it full consideration, and there will never in all probability be a project constructed under this bill, if it becomes a law, without a provision for a lock in the dam that is built.

That is no small matter, either; because, in the majority of the small projects, the cost of the facilities for navigation that will be required will amount to nearly half the cost of the entire improvement, and if the United States gets the benefit of such improvement in navigation without any cost, it is certainly obtaining a very great benefit without any expense whatever to it.

I merely want to give an illustration, Mr. President. In my State, 35 miles below Chattanooga in the Tennessee River, there is a very narrow place in the river called "The Suck." An act of Congress was passed allowing a company to build a dam there at its own expense for the purpose of developing water power. That dam has resulted in creating slack-water navigation for 35 miles, where it did not exist before. That improvement, as at first estimated by the engineers who examined it, would cost $3,000,000. Before it was completed it cost Anthony Brady, of New York, $9,000,000. There is a nine million dollar investment, with locks of the latest and most modern character, affording the finest facilities for navigation, and creating 35 miles of slack-water navigation, without one dollar of expense to the United States. This bill simply provides for such further improvements.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], a few moments ago, in his remarks made the statement that there was but one Senator in the Chamber besides the Senator who had introduced the pending amendment who appeared to be in favor of the amendment. That perhaps will justify me in saying that I wish to add another to those who favor the amendment of the Senator from Montana, or at least the principle of it.

I have read over this bill with some care, and I want to say that I do not think it contains all the provisions that a bill should contain that has for its purpose the conservation of our water powers. I think there are some provisions that should be added to it. In fact, I want to take the liberty of saying that I do not think this bill is framed upon the principles that I should like to see in a bill that has for its purpose the conservation of our water powers. If the purpose is merely to take care of our navigable rivers, without reference to the value of the water powers that may be developed on them, perhaps the bill goes far enough. If, however, we have for our primary purpose not only the development of navigation in streams but the development of water powers, believing that in this day and age they are an institution that is going to exert a tremendous influence on our industries and our economic life in general, then it does seem to me that this measure falls far short of what a water-power bill should be. I think it comes right down to the question whether a bill should be framed which holds that all that the Government of the United States has the power to legislate in regard to is navigation, or whether the United States should concern itself with the development of water power which is always incident to the improvement of navigation by the building of dams.

I am one of those who believe that the development of the water power is an important thing of itself, and that that is one of the matters that are of first importance in a bill of this kind. For that reason I am going to discuss it from that point of view. When I say, however, that I favor the amendment of the Senator from Montana I do not want to say that I shall vote for it, even with that amendment in it, unless there are some other vital things put into the bill and other radical changes made there.

I understand the position of the Senator from Tennessee to be that we have no right to impose any conditions in a water-power franchise except such as relate to navigation; that there is nothing else that concerns us than this; and, therefore, that the provision as to compensation or franchise fee, or anything of that sort, is a condition that can not properly be imposed by the bill; that we have no power to put it within the bill; in fact, that we have no interest in or power over navigable waters except as regards navigation.

If that be true, why has there been so much talk about the conservation of water powers? Why do persons come to the Government of the United States at all, or to a State, to get a franchise to put a dam across a river for the purpose of developing water power? If the United States has no control and is not particularly concerned about the dam except as to its navigable features, why do we not say that anyone can put a dam across a navigable stream as long as he does not unnecessarily obstruct the waters, and then concern ourselves not at all why he puts it there or what he wants to do with it?

I think there is something more than the mere putting of the dam across the stream that concerns the Government and concerns the States.

In the first place, this bill expressly provides that no one shall maintain a dam across a navigable stream except political subdivisions of States, municipal corporations, corporations, companies, and associations. It is well known that the ownership of dam sites is largely in the hands of individual property owners, riparian owners, and yet it would appear from this bill that the Government does not contemplate, and in fact will not permit, as individual to build a dam or maintain a water power unless there are no municipal or public utilities to do the work. It therefore contemplates, and must necessarily contemplate, that these political subdivisions or public utilities must go and procure a dam site and flowage rights in order to maintain a dam. How are they going to do it? They can only do it in two ways, namely, by purchase or as provided in the bill, namely, by the use of the power of eminent domain.

Why should the bill provide that only certain governmental subdivisions or public utilities shall have the right to condemn? Why does not the State permit a private person to put a dam across a stream if he owns a dam site? Why confine the privilege to municipalities or corporations of a quasi public nature if it has not for its purpose the regulation of the water power developed as a means or inevitable incident of the improvement of navigation?

Why not let every riparian owner dam up the water on his own premises on his request or demand if he is entitled to the use of his water power on his land as a matter of right? Surely one riparian owner has the same right as his neighbor. The answer is that then we could have no development of water power that would amount to anything.

There has been some talk here about the title to flowing water. I take it that every riparian owner has the same title to flowing water that every other riparian owner has. If that is true, then each riparian owner can build a dam if he sees fit to do so, and has just as much title to that flowing water as it flows past his premises as has every other riparian owner. But this bill seeks to take away the right from all riparian owners and to give it to a new institution, a public utility or a municipality, for the purpose of permitting that institution to operate and maintain a dam and develop a water power there.

I can not see that the bill gives any preference to municipalities. In fact, it does not give any preference whatever to municipalities. Such are placed on the same plane with other corporations acquiring rights thereto. I think the Senator will agree with me that those that will avail themselves of the provisions of this act will be largely public utilities, and the primary effect of this measure will be to turn the water-power privileges of this whole country into the hands of the public utilities, to wit, the water-power interests, of the country. In order to do that you take away the privilege of the riparian individual and give public utilities and municipalities the right to take it by eminent domain. You give them the right to take away not only the land to be overflowed but the very dam site itself; and when you give them the right to condemn flowage rights they have the right to step in and take away from every other riparian owner affected by the dam the right that he possesses to put up a dam, if there is such a right. Now, it is plain that the Government would have no power to do this if such development were not for a public use or a use affected or invested with a public interest. In other words, the giving of a franchise or permit is grant of a special privilege. The powers conferred and privileges granted are of a nature not enjoyed by the ordinary citizen as a matter of common right. When they come here for a franchise under this act, therefore, they are coming here to obtain a special privilege from the United States which gives them the right to step in and take away the riparian rights of any owner of a water-power site and the property rights of any man affected by the flowage.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HUSTING. I do.

Mr. SHIELDS. This bill does not prohibit riparian proprietors from building structures in navigable streams. For a hundred years the owners of riparian rights in waters had a right to erect, or might erect with the consent of the States, structures in navigable rivers. In 1899, however, the Congress enacted a statute that absolutely prohibited the building of any structure by anyone—of course, this includes riparian proprietors, whether individuals or corporations—in a river without the express consent of Congress.

That is the law to-day. The object of this bill is to repeal that law, and to allow the riparian owner, whether it be a municipality or a public-utility corporation or an individual, to build dams for water-power purposes under a permit granted by the Secretary of War instead of by Congress, as heretofore. It is to liberalize, to increase the rights of riparian proprietors, rather than to put any restrictions upon them. The only provision here in behalf of municipalities or other subdivisions of States is to give them a preference in building such dams when the power to be developed is for a public-utility purpose. That is the present state of the law, and such are the provisions of the bill. It is to enlarge the rights of riparian proprietors, instead of to restrict them.

Mr. HUSTING. I will ask the Senator this question: Has that right of the United States Government to forbid the construction and maintenance of dams across navigable streams ever been challenged or disputed, or is it now challenged or disputed?

Mr. SHIELDS. I suppose the Senator will find in the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States 100 or 200 cases upon that subject. Under the common law which we adopted, the common law of England, navigable waters were those in which the tide ebbed and flowed. It was early discovered that that definition was wholly inapplicable to conditions in the United States, where we had these great rivers in which the tide did not ebb and flow. In the case of the Genesee Chief—I have forgotten in just what volume it is reported—it was held that navigable rivers in this country were those which were navigable in fact for commercial purposes; and it was held in that and subsequent cases—the latest, I believe, is the case of the Chandler-Dunbar Co.—that the power of Congress in determining what was an obstruction in a river, or, in other words, its general jurisdiction on the subject of the navigability of our streams, was absolute, unlimited, and not subject to review. It is a legislative power, and one with which the courts can not interfere.

So when the Congress enacted the statute of 1899, prohibiting, in its power to regulate commerce, the erection of any obstruction in a navigable river, there was no possible way of challenging it, and it has been repeatedly enforced. The only way now to get these improvements is to repeal that statute, and to provide some other method by which the consent of the Congress can be given. This bill delegates that power to the Secretary of War. Really, perhaps the best way—although I do not think Congress would consent to it—would be to repeal the act of 1899 and restore the old law that anyone, with the consent of the State—which has, to a certain extent, concurrent jurisdiction with Congress over navigable waters—may go ahead and build the structure, and then Congress only could remove it, or pass statutes which would punish the obstruction, similar to this, now, in case it was determined that it was an obstruction. Of course there was no common-law offense on the subject. We have no common law in the United States on the subject, and without a statute providing that it shall be a criminal offense to place such an obstruction in a navigable stream it could not be prohibited.

Mr. HUSTING. It is generally recognized, is it not, that the United States Government has a right to forbid the construction and maintenance of dams across navigable streams without its consent? That is correct, is it not? I say, that is generally recognized? The Supreme Court has never been called upon to say that the United States has not the right to forbid the construction and maintenance of dams across navigable streams in the United States?

Mr. SHIELDS. Under the commerce clause, the Supreme Court has repeatedly held that the power of Congress to regulate structures over, under, or in navigable streams is absolute and unlimited.

Mr. HUSTING. Yes. So that brings us back to this proposition: It is sought under this bill to give certain corporations, municipal and otherwise, the right to come in and ask permission of Congress to build and maintain a dam to develop water power from the use of navigable waters, and to condemn and take away this same right from others who are just as much entitled to such right. It is true they have to pay for the lands they take; they have to pay them for the dam site; they have to pay them for the flowage; but, nevertheless and notwithstanding, they take away from that riparian owner the valuable right to develop the water power and give another person the privilege of using the navigable waters in that stream at that place for his benefit and his profit. So it is a special privilege that is being asked whenever anyone comes to Congress or to the legislature of any of the States and asks for a milldam franchise for the purpose of developing water power.

It has been stated here that the United States Government has no proprietary right in the running waters of a navigable stream. That is undisputed; but I do not think it will be disputed that the riparian owner has no proprietary right in the running waters of a navigable stream. What is the right of a riparian owner? As I understand, the right of a riparian owner is the right to the use and enjoyment of the waters as they are wont to flow over and past his premises.

There are certain other rights that he has that I need not try to enumerate, but his right goes to the use of the water of a navigable stream in its natural condition. He has not any vested right or any inherent right to build a dam and obstruct the flow of these navigable waters. This he can not do without a grant from the sovereign authority. He simply has the right to use the waters of the stream in their ordinary flow. So has any other riparian owner the right to use them in their ordinary flow. It is only when he comes to Congress or the legislature of a State and seeks to enjoy the use of these waters in an extraordinary way—that is, by damming up these waters, by overflowing a lot of the productive domain, and in other ways interfering with the natural course of the river and the public's right in the stream, taking away from others the enjoyment in the same way of the lands they possess—it is only then, when he comes for a franchise or a permit to Congress or the legislature of the State, when he comes seeking special privilege, something that the ordinary citizen does not enjoy as a matter of common right—it is then that the Government or the State believes it is its duty to impose certain conditions upon the one who desires to enjoy this special privilege, so that the public at large may derive, directly or indirectly, some benefit from this concession, so that the privileged governmental agent shall divide with or pay over some of the profits which he could only enjoy by such valuable governmental favor or preference.

So that a grant of future interest is more than a mere power to regulate navigation. Its mandate goes to the question whether privileged citizens or privileged corporations may come before a legislature and before Congress and ask for a concession of great value—privileges, as the Senator from Montana says, in one instance in his State a concession worth half a million dollars—given so that they may enjoy this concession, not enjoyed by others as a matter of common right. The question is then put before those who give the concession whether something should not be exacted from those who come asking for such special favors and privileges, so that that which might be enjoyed by others in the same way may be to them in some way compensated for.

The giving of the right of eminent domain is a gift of sovereignty. When anyone comes before a legislature or before a Congress and asks for a franchise, he comes asking to be made a State agent for a certain purpose. The United States could go into the business of building dams and developing water power. A good many think that that would be the right way to do it; some think that the Government should take possession of the streams and do these things. But because it is not generally considered at this time the proper thing to do we must perform this work through others. We must create a State agency or a governmental agency to carry out this project; and, especially when this concession will be given to a State or to a municipality or to a public utility, creating them for a certain purpose stated in the grant a governmental agency vested with sovereign powers, the power certainly must remain in the creator or in the franchise-giving power to regulate that agency, and we can still tell them under what conditions the sovereignty or the governmental rights which they are going to exercise and enjoy shall be given to them.

I think it follows, as a matter of course, that where the Government not only gives to a private citizen or delegates to the State or to the municipality or to a public utility the right to put a dam across a navigable stream, but gives them the right of eminent domain, it thereby gives them the right to create a condition which oftentimes is a menace to public safety; it thereby gives them the right sometimes to flow thousands and thousands of acres of land that are taken out of the area of productivity—it invests them with other great rights in that very manner, by such grant of sovereignty to them, and thereby constituting them a governmental agency—their business and their duties are thus invested with a public interest, so that the Government has a right, and it is its duty and its business, in my judgment, to tell them how they must operate it and under what conditions they will be permitted to enjoy their sovereign rights and exercise their sovereign duties.

In Norway, where they have permitted developments of this kind, they base their right to regulate these sorts of development and to impose certain conditions—among others, that of compensation or of franchise fee—on the fact, in addition to other things, that anyone who covers a wide area of land with a large pond of water, with a large flowage, and thus destroys the producing power of that area, must in some way compensate the public at large for such land confiscated and make good the enormous loss suffered by the public by reason of the taking of such lands from the productive area.

I did not expect to talk upon this subject this afternoon; but I do think, and that is the position I feel I ought to take in this matter, that this is not merely a question of locks and dams and log chutes or anything of that kind, but it is something more than this; of far more importance than that; the control and regulation of water powers respectively connected with development of navigation. The question is, are we going to regulate the water powers of this country or are we going to let them regulate and control themselves and perhaps us?

There is no disguising the fact that since the invention of the new methods of transmission of hydroelectric power the importance of water powers has increased to an enormous extent. There is no disguising the fact that in a short time they will exert, as they are already exerting, but to a far higher degree, a profound influence on the industrial development of this country, on transportation in this country, on the lighting of cities, on the propulsion of trolley cars, and on the general comfort and welfare of the people. It was because of this growing importance, which has been recognized by the statesmen of this country, that the attempt has been made, on the part of States and on the part of the Government, to so regulate them that they may become an instrument of good rather than one of evil or at least of not unmixed good.

The requirement of compensation as part consideration for the franchise is only one of a number of requirements that should be imposed upon those who are granted the special privileges here under consideration. I hope to be able to speak upon this later in the course of this debate. I just merely want to say, in conclusion, that it seems to me that the right of the Government to impose a franchise fee is quite clear and free from doubt. In the Chandler-Dunbar case, mentioned by the Senator from Tennessee, the court held that the United States Government in taking over and improving the water power for the purpose of improving the navigation of the St. Mary River could sell all power that could be generated from surplus waters not needed for navigation for such price as it deemed proper. It is true that in that case the Government itself made the improvement and developed, or at least improved, the power. I can see, however, no difference in principle, as far as the question at issue is concerned, whether the Government itself creates or develops the power or whether it delegates it to some other governmental agent. If, since the Government itself can dispose of surplus power incidentally developed in connection with the improvement of navigation, then how can anyone contend that it can not delegate this power and right on the part of its agent to use or dispose of surplus power and, as consideration for such grant of privilege, retain a part instead of all of the revenue derived therefrom? Now, it appears to me that by reason of the things that I have specifically mentioned the Government has not only the right, but it is the duty of the Government to safeguard the public interests in water power developed upon navigable streams, but that it also has the power to impose such conditions as in its judgment will safeguard the public rights and promote the public interests and welfare. In addition, however, to what I have pointed out, the Government not only has claimed, but has exercised and possesses the right to prohibit the construction and maintenance of dams over navigable rivers, because of the plenary power vested in it over such waters. No one can construct or maintain a dam without such permission. The Government may give or withhold such permission at its own pleasure. Consequently it can give such permission on such conditions and upon such terms as in its judgment may best promote the public welfare. This permission, coupled with such conditions and accepted by the franchise holder or permittee, is a binding contract upon the franchise holder and permittee. He can not question such right or violate the conditions of his grant. So it would seem to me that both as a matter of law and as a matter of right and justice a condition such as proposed by the Senator from Montana, providing for the payment of compensation as part consideration for the permit or franchise, ought to be imposed, and I therefore favor the amendment of the Senator from Montana. I support it notwithstanding that I believe the payments imposed therein are inadequate, and in supporting it I do not want to be understood as indorsing the bill in its amended form, should the amendment be adopted. As I said before, I can not support the bill unless it is amended radically in many respects. I am supporting the amendment of the Senator from Montana because of the principle involved in the amendment, namely, the right of the Government to impose a condition of that kind.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the debate, I think, is closed; and preparatory to a vote, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hollis	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Hughes	Martine, N. J.	Smoot
Borah	Husting	Nelson	Stone
Brandegee	James	Norris	Sutherland
Broussard	Johnson, Me.	Oliver	Swanson
Catron	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Thomas
Chamberlain	Jones	Page	Thompson
Chilton	Kenyon	Poindexter	Walsh
Clapp	Kern	Pomerene	Warren
Cummins	La Follette	Robinson	Weeks
Curtis	Lane	Shafroth	Williams
du Pont	Lippitt	Sheppard
Fletcher	Lodge	Shields
Gallinger	McLean	Simmons

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY]. He is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH].

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending question is the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Montana proposes to impose a tax upon the water-power development made with private capital. The subject is one which was very carefully considered by the subcommittee and rejected. I hope that the amendment will not now be adopted as it would practically destroy the bill as reported and the entire principle upon which it was framed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I do not wish to delay a vote upon this question, and I shall say but a word.

As I understand the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana, it undertakes to confer upon the Government the authority to make a charge for what is to all intents and purposes the use of the water of a public stream for the purpose of developing power. The Senator speaks about that as being a privilege which is granted by the Federal Government, and insists that therefore the Federal Government should have a right to make a charge for it. I think that description proceeds upon a misconception of what the Government of the United States actually does in the premises.

As I understand the rule that has been established beyond all question by the authorities, it is that the bed of a stream and the water of a stream, so far as they can belong to anybody, belong to the State, and the State has absolute control over both. That was decided, I think, very clearly in the cases that have already been referred to. In the case of Martin v. Waddell (16 Pet., 367), the Supreme Court said:

> For when the Revolution took place the people of each State became themselves sovereign; and in that character hold the absolute right to all their navigable waters, and the soils under them, for their own common use, subject only to the rights since surrendered by the Constitution to the General Government.

And again, in Pollard v. Hagan (3 How., 212), the Supreme Court said:

> By the preceding course of reasoning we have arrived at these general conclusions: First. The shores of navigable waters and the soils under them were not granted by the Constitution to the United States, but were reserved to the States, respectively. Second. The new States have the same rights, sovereignty, and jurisdiction over this subject as the original States. Third. The right of the United States to the public land and the power of Congress to make all needful rules and regulations for the sale and disposition thereof conferred no power to grant to the plaintiffs the land (tidewater land) in controversy.

So, Mr. President, it would seem to be perfectly clear that the United States Government would have no power, as a matter standing separate and apart by itself, to grant or to withhold from grant the use of the waters of a stream within the limits of a State. It has but one power and one function to perform, and that is to safeguard the navigability of the stream. There its power begins and ends. If it had no control over navigation, if it did not possess the power to regulate interstate commerce, and thereby to regulate navigation, it would have no power in the premises whatsoever.

What does Congress do when it passes one of these bills authorizing the building of a dam? Congress by that simply says to the licensee: "We are charged with the responsibility of seeing that obstructions to navigation are prevented, and therefore you will not be permitted to erect a dam, except in such a way as not to interfere with the navigability of the stream; and to that end we will supervise and superintend the construction of the dam." That is the only power which Congress has. To deduce from that power an authority on the part of the Government of the United States to charge a citizen for the use of the water of the stream to generate power is to draw a deduction that is to my mind wholly unwarranted.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] talks about the power of the Government, but it seems to me that he confuses two very different meanings of the word "power." Of course, in one sense, in the sense of its ability, in fact, to do the thing, the Congress of the United States has the power. It may say you can not erect this dam without our consent, because we have control of the matter of navigation, and before we will give our consent to the erection of the dam we will exact conditions which, standing alone, we have not any power to exact. But, nevertheless, Congress has no rightful authority to do that. We have no independent constitutional power to do the thing itself. So when we undertake to do it we have exerted a naked power without any legal or constitutional warrant for doing so.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. Suppose that the amendment which I propose were adopted and a permit were granted by the Secretary of War and accepted by the permittee under the terms of which he obligated himself to pay the charge therein provided for, could he escape the payment?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Probably not.

Mr. WALSH. Could he occupy the stream unless he did make the payment?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Again I answer the Senator probably not. But that is not the question. We might say to a transcontinental railroad, You shall not be permitted to do a particular thing which you want to do unless you consent to pay the Government one-half of your revenue. But that would be simply to extort from the railroad company something which we had no legal power to compel as a condition for permitting something which ought to be permitted without condition.

What I am saying is that we have not any authority under the Constitution to exercise control over the waters of a stream except in so far as that may be necessary to preserve the navigability of the stream, and having no right to compel a citizen to pay a tax for utilizing the water of a stream, we have not any right to annex it as a condition to granting him the privilege of constructing a dam which we do only because, under the commerce clause of the Constitution, we must see that the navigability of the stream is preserved.

The Constitution of the United States provides that no person shall be compelled in a criminal case to be a witness against himself. Of course, in one sense a court has power to compel a defendant to do that thing—that is, the defendant might be called to the stand, objection made, and the court order him to proceed, but that would be without legal authority. It would simply be the exercise of brute force. In pretty much the same way if we exact from the licensee the payment of a tax for the privilege of building a dam to divert water for generating power, it is the exercise of a naked brute force and not the exercise of any legitimate power under the Constitution.

The Senator from Montana says that the Government of the United States, if it should construct a dam itself, and thereby should generate power not necessary to be used in the operation of the dam or gates or machinery about the dam, it could undoubtedly sell or lease that surplus power. I have no doubt about that.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. Might not the Government go still further and provide its own market by going into the manufacturing business and then coming in competition with private enterprise?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No, Mr. President; I think the Government of the United States has not any power to do that.

Mr. THOMAS. If it has the power to dispose of the force generated by the water in navigable streams to individuals or to companies, it certainly has the power to sell it or to utilize it; and it seems to me that, if it has those powers, it also can go further and provide a market, if it be necessary, by going into the manufacturing business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The difference is this, Mr. President: The Government of the United States, in the exercise of an undoubted power, namely, the power to regulate commerce, may construct dams for the purpose of improving the navigability of streams.

Mr. THOMAS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If, in the exercise of that undoubted constitutional power, it incidentally produces electric power it may dispose of it in precisely the same way as the Government may sell Army stores which it has accumulated in the legitimate exercise of its war powers; it may dispose of surplus stores. It has, for example, a lot of clothing on hand which it can not utilize, which has been bought for a legitimate purpose; having no longer any use for it, of course it may dispose of it; it may dispose of arms that have become obsolete; in fact, it is doing that all the time; but it would have no power to go into the business of manufacturing clothing and selling it. It would have no power to become a merchant for the purpose of buying clothing and selling it in the market; it may only dispose of those things because they have been accumulated incidentally in the exercise of some legitimate power under the Constitution.

Mr. THOMAS. The instance which the Senator supposes is not the instance which would arise under this bill. Here the dam is to be constructed by other parties dealing with the Government, and not by the Government itself, notwithstanding which the Government will, if this amendment carries, insist upon imposing a charge for the use of the power to be generated by the current thus created, with which it has nothing to do, except to grant the permit.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was coming to that. I was about to complete what I had to say upon that subject——

Mr. THOMAS. I beg the Senator's pardon for interrupting him.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. By saying that the case which is presented by the amendment is not at all a parallel case with the one which the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] supposes, because in the case that he supposes the Government is simply disposing of surplus property that it has accumulated in the exercise of a legitimate power, while in the case presented by the amendment it is undertaking to compel a citizen to pay for something which the Government has absolutely no ownership in or control over at all. They present, as it seems to me, two wholly distinct and different propositions.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator's attention has been called to section 10 of this bill, and both phases of the question of charging tolls have been presented. This amendment is directed to the provisions of the bill which authorize dams to be erected which will facilitate navigation and create water power. The amendment proposes to tax this power, created without any expense to the Government, purely with private capital. The tenth section of the bill authorizes the Secretary of War to lease the power created by dams constructed by the United States at its own expense, and where it becomes the riparian proprietor, which is an entirely different case from the cases to which this amendment applies.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. A wholly different case.

Mr. SHIELDS. A wholly different case; for in that case the United States is the riparian proprietor; it has a property interest; but in the case where this amendment is proposed to apply, the United States has no proprietary interest, but a mere police power in regulating the navigation in the streams. It is for that reason that the committee opposes this amendment and thinks it is wholly unjust and would practically destroy the principle upon which this measure is framed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I quite agree with the Senator from Tennessee about that. That is what I have been undertaking to say. Under section 10, as I understand, what we authorize the Government to do is to dispose of a piece of property which it has acquired incidentally in the exercise of an undoubted power under the Constitution.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. That feature of the discussion is a rather interesting one, and perhaps the Senator from Utah did not fully catch the line of argument which I was endeavoring to pursue. You can very readily conceive that the Government might carry on a work of improvement of this character, improving the stream for purposes of navigation, and, in connection with that, it would develop power which would be so valuable to the Government that it would pay for all of the work of improving the navigation of the stream; that the Government could derive a great revenue from it as well as improving the stream. Now, the Government, instead of doing that work itself, creates a governmental agency; it permits a public corporation to do that work. A public corporation improves the navigation of the stream, but a large amount of power is developed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. One moment. The Senator from Utah would, as I take it, assume that, under those circumstances, the man who developed the power would be entitled to all of it and to all the profits in it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No, Mr. President.

Mr. WALSH. My contention is that the Government that gave him the concession could say to him, "You will have to divide with us the profit that you will get, because if we made the improvement ourselves we would get all the profit."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, that is not the question I am arguing. It may be conceded, for the sake of the argument, that the Senator is right in what he has just stated, namely, that if the Government of the United States, instead of building a dam for the purpose of improving navigation, makes use of some public agent to build the dam for the purpose of improving navigation, the Government will have control over the power incidentally developed; but that is not the purpose of this amendment. This amendment is directed to a case where the citizen or the private corporation builds a dam for the purpose of generating power, and the Government steps into the matter simply to see that the dam constructed for that purpose is built in such a way as not to interfere with navigation. It is not a case where the Government itself has built a dam to carry out an undoubted power of the Constitution, or has employed a public agency to construct a dam to carry out an undoubted power of the Constitution, but it is a case where the private citizen has constructed a dam for private purposes, namely, to generate electric power, and the Government steps in to see that in doing that thing he does not interfere with the navigability of the stream. In that case the Government of the United States has no right to say to the citizen, "As a condition of our supervising the building of this dam and seeing that it does not affect the navigability of the stream, we are going to charge you for the water power you develop, which we have no independent power under the Constitution to interfere with in any way, shape, or manner."

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question. Would a State have the right to exact tolls from private parties who built such a dam as is contemplated by this bill?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That presents an entirely different question. I would say yes; I would not like to say just to what extent or under what conditions; but I have no doubt that the whole matter is under the control of the States.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I understand that they would have the right to levy a franchise tax.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Without doubt.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, there is a special provision in the bill making the development subject to all the laws of the respective States and to taxation that other similar property within the State is subject to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Exactly; that is where it ought to be left.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRYAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. Were he present I understand he would vote "nay," and, as I intend to vote in the negative, I will take the liberty of voting. I vote "nay."

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). Announcing my pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], who is absent, but I am informed that if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote upon this question, and therefore I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUM-

BER], which I transfer to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. Understanding from his colleague that if he were present he would vote the same way that I am about to vote, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHILTON. I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. CATRON. I have a general pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and vote "nay."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I again announce the pair existing between the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] and the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. TILLMAN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I am requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]; and

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 36, as follows:

YEAS—15.

Chamberlain	James	Martine, N. J.	Pomerene
Hollis	Kern	Myers	Thompson
Hughes	La Follette	Norris	Walsh

So Mr. WALSH's amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I have some amendments on the same page that perhaps will not be objectionable to the Senator from Tennessee. They refer to that provision of the bill which contemplates the appropriation of public lands. I am sure that if the Senator from Tennessee were more familiar with the disposition of the public lands he would not want to have any rights in the public lands accorded to anyone except with the permission of the Secretary of the Interior. If there were no other reason, it becomes absolutely essential to the proper execution of the laws in relation to the disposition of the public lands that the records in the office of the Secretary of the Interior should disclose all encumbrances of any character upon those lands. I refer the Senator to the language found about the middle of page 6, as follows——

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, can the Senator offer his amendment? Then I will ask to lay the bill aside.

Mr. WALSH. Very well. After the word "War," in line 12, I propose to insert "and the Secretary of the Interior," so that it will read:

That such grantee in the construction, maintenance, and operation of such dam or diversion structure and accessory works may, with the authority of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior, occupy and use, to the extent necessary for the project, any lands—

And so forth.

Also, before the first word in line 13, insert:

And for the period of his permit to maintain the dam to be constructed by him.

Also——

Mr. SHIELDS. Has the Senator a further amendment?

Mr. WALSH. They are to the same point. After the word "occupied," in line 21, insert "and the other rights acquired thereunder when such land is to be occupied," and insert the word "annual" after "reasonable," and insert the word "said" after "the," before "Secretary," in line 23, and after the word "War" insert "and the said Secretary of the Interior."

These amendments all refer to the same point—that the right to occupy the public lands and the charges for the occupancy shall be fixed by the joint action of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I think upon further consideration of all the latter amendments the Senator will come to the conclusion that they are entirely criticisms of the language and that the purport of them is fully implied by the bill as it now stands; but I can not agree to the amendment that the control over this matter is to be vested jointly in the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior. This bill relates to navigable streams, over which the Secretary of the Interior has not and should not have any jurisdiction; and it would lead, I think, to unutterable confusion. But I do not wish to go into the matter at this hour. I am willing, if the Senator is, that the matter should be disposed of without any further discussion.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, Mr. President, I am perfectly satisfied that the Senator from Tennessee can not have any kind of an idea of the purpose of the amendment I tendered or he would not say so.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator is entirely mistaken, because he gave me that amendment four or five days ago, and I thought it wholly inapplicable to the bill. I really could not see that it would in any way be of any advantage, but, practically, it would very greatly injure it, to divide the jurisdiction of navigable rivers between the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of War, contrary to all the precedents and all the history of such matters.

Mr. WALSH. I beg that the Senator will read the provision. It does not apply to the occupancy of the river at all. It applies to the occupancy of public lands.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, of course these matters are always in the hands of the Senate to dispose of as the Senate pleases; but I very much hope that the consideration of this bill may be completed, as I am anxious to proceed promptly to-morrow with the consideration of the Nicaragua treaty. I desire to ask the Senator from Tennessee what his plan is. I do not want to come in any way in conflict with him in the disposition of his bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the desire of those favoring this bill is to keep it before the Senate for a final vote. It is believed that it can be disposed of not later than to-morrow; and I desire that that be done, if there are not other matters that so press upon the time of the Senate that it should be laid aside.

Mr. STONE. I desire to say that I have personally requested Senators to be here to-morrow, in the hope of getting a vote on the resolution to be submitted to ratify this treaty. I wish to avoid any sort of conflict with the Senator. I do not know, and of course no one can tell, how long it will take to dispose of any question.

Mr. SHIELDS. After conference with quite a number of Senators who are opposed to some of the provisions of this bill and desire to offer some amendments, as well as those who favor the bill, I believe it will be possible to dispose of it to-morrow.

Mr. STONE. Does the Senator mean it will occupy the whole day to-morrow?

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes. If the Senator could allow the executive business to be postponed, I believe it would save time to finish the bill now, while it is being thoroughly considered and understood by the Senate.

Mr. STONE. We will dispose of that question to-morrow.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 5 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 17, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 16, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we draw near to Thee that we may receive the uplift of the spirit of truth, which shall make us wise and just, pure and noble, strong and faithful, that we may walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called and justly merit at the close of this day Thine approbation. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. TEMPLE, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of Patrick H. Magee (H. R. 8258, 63d Cong.), no adverse report having been made thereon.

Also, without leaving copies, papers in the case of Oliver C. C. Pollock (H. R. 12656, 63d Cong.), no adverse report having been made thereon.

INDEX OF HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to present two privileged resolutions from the Committee on Accounts, which I am sure will not provoke any discussion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri for the present consideration of the privileged resolution, notwithstanding it is Calendar Wednesday?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 140 (H. Rept. 202).

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and is hereby, authorized to have made an index of the hearings had before said committee on the subject of preparedness, the costs, and expenses therefor not exceeding $350, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers ordered by the Committee on Military Affairs, signed by the chairman thereof and approved by the Committee on Accounts, evidenced by the signature of the chairman thereof.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is to authorize the Committee on Military Affairs to provide an index of its hearings before that committee on the subject of preparedness, which, I think, will be of great value to the House.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The resolution says "vouchers ordered by the Committee on Military Affairs." I think that that should be "audited."

Mr. LLOYD. It means "authorized"; perhaps "issued" would be the better word.

Mr. MANN. The committee approves the vouchers. They audit them, and send them to the Committee on Accounts, and you approve them. I think it should be "audited by the Committee on Military Affairs."

Mr. LLOYD. I do not object to that word. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by inserting in the place of "ordered" the word "audited."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 6 of the resolution strike out the word "ordered" and insert in lieu thereof the word "audited."

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

C. H. ENGLAND.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I offer another privileged resolution which I ask unanimous consent to present at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 141 (H. Rept. 201).

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, the sum of $44.48 to C. H. England for clerical services rendered the Committee on Ways and Means from the 6th to the 14th, both inclusive, days of December, 1915.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, the stenographer for the Committee on Ways and Means resigned on the 6th of December. Mr. England was employed, but there was no one really authorized to make that employment. He rendered service from the 6th of December until the 14th of December, at which time the Committee on Ways and Means was authorized by the House, and then the chairman of that committee named him. This is to pay him for the services he rendered between the 6th and the 14th days of December.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PENSIONS, WAR WITH SPAIN, ETC.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the unfinished business is H. R. 54. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] will take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 54, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 54) to pension widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served in the War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, or in China.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 2. That no agent, attorney, or other person engaged in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting any claim under the provisions of this act shall, directly or indirectly, contract for, demand, receive, or retain for such services in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting such claim a sum greater than $10, which sum shall be payable only on the order of the Commissioner of Pensions; and any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section, or shall wrongfully withhold from the pensioner or claimant the whole or any part of a pension or claim allowed or due such pensioner or claimant under this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every offense, be fined not exceeding $500 or be imprisoned at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words "at hard labor," in line 19, page 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 19, strike out the words "at hard labor."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio that those words are not now contained in the statutes.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. We accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

[Mr. SULLOWAY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would consider myself remiss if I did not say a word in favor of the pending measure. I gave similar bills which failed in the Senate, my support in the last two Congresses not only by my vote but also by my utterances on the floor of the House. It was a great surprise and disappointment to me that the other branch of the Congress did not appreciate the value of the services of the Spanish-American veterans as much as did the Representatives of the people who sit in this Chamber, and I earnestly hope the present Congress will not adjourn before final and favorable action is taken on the pending bill. Tennessee furnished during the Spanish-American War 6,531 volunteer soldiers, and the city which I have the honor to represent, my home town, Knoxville, in point of volunteers, stood next to New York City. Tennessee sent a regiment to the Philippines, one to Cuba, and one to Porto Rico, and I will leave it to the impartial records of the War Department to say whether they gave a good account of themselves. This is the first legislation asked by the Spanish-American soldiers in reference to general legislation since the close of that war, more than 15 years ago. It is a modest request; it is a just request, one that should meet with the unanimous approval of the House. More than 500 American soldiers were killed and wounded in the Philippine Islands alone. If you include those who died from disease, the total is 12,000. There were 812 battles and skirmishes in the Philippine Islands, and while the other branch of Congress seems anxious and eager to give away the Philippine Islands, to surrender what these gallant soldiers from all over the Republic achieved and secured for our country, I hope this House and the country will not find itself in accord with what I consider the unpatriotic, unwise, and unjust position of the coordinate branch of the Congress. [Applause on the Republican side.] We obtained in the Spanish-American War a territory in the far Orient which gives us a standing there, which gives us an opening or a gateway to the great oriental trade of the present and future, a territory equal to all of the New England States and New York State combined, and while our trade prior to our going there amounted to only $500,000 a year, it has increased now to $27,000,000 a year. We planted

Old Glory in the Pacific, and carried with it American civilization. We carried with it a progressive Government, progressive American civilization and development in those islands which is the admiration and the envy of every country in the world which has colonial possessions. We carried civil government, freedom of speech, freedom of religion, freedom of the press, and we have given the natives practically full control of their affairs. By this war we made America a world power, and for one I am in favor of standing by the fruits which were the result of the courage, endurance, and suffering of the American soldier in the Philippine Islands. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Certainly.

Mr. GORDON. How much have the Philippine Islands cost the United States up to date in money besides the $20,000,000 that was paid for them when they finally came into our possession?

Mr. AUSTIN. The islands are now self-sustaining. They are paying their own way, and practically the only expense to the American Government at this time is the transportation of the American Army back and forth in our own transports. That expense can be reduced, if not eliminated, because we have established the Philippine Scouts and Constabulary, and there is no reason why the American Army can not after a time be withdrawn and the expense practically eliminated.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. If you will get me some more time, I will be only too glad to yield.

Mr. GORDON. I just want to ask the gentleman whether or not the Philippine people pay for our Army there?

Mr. AUSTIN. I stated what the only expense was. We must have the Army. I believe the gentleman is opposed to increasing the Army, but we are going to increase it nevertheless. We have got to have an Army. This service means experience and training for the Army in the Far East. This service also means that America is in the Orient for American civilization and American trade, and, if necessary, to protect the interests of our country in peace or in war in the Orient. The flag is there, and there to stay, in spite of the un-American action of the Senate of the United States. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

[Mr. SLOAN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. COLEMAN. Mr. Chairman, it has been said on the floor of this House in the discussion of the measure now before us that this is a grossly extravagant body. With this statement I am in hearty accord and believe that we are in need of strong, sturdy, earnest men who will rise up and protect the Treasury against the constant raids that are attempted. Much of the extravagance is in the expenditure of money by Congress for purposes that are foreign to the duties of the Federal Government. In fact, we are living in an extravagant age and one in which public expenditures in our Nation, in our States, and in local communities are carried beyond all reasonable bounds and which if continued unchecked must sooner or later lead to disaster. But in the matter of pensions for the dependent families of deceased veterans who in the hour of their country's need proffered so great a sacrifice we can not afford to retrench.

This is a subject in which the Federal Government is directly concerned, and it is to the interest of the Government as well as in the performance of its rightful obligation to shield from want the families of the brave volunteers who protected the Government in its need. And when from the body of our citizenship in time of national peril men spring forth to their country's defense it is but fitting that that country in turn provide for their needy families at least by so moderate a pension as this bill provides.

I know not what legislation shall emerge from this Congress in these unusual days with reference to military preparedness, but of one thing I am confident, and that is that European militarism shall not obtain a permanent lodging place in our free soil and that whatever action is taken in the present exigency when normal conditions have returned and men think naturally under those conditions, we, as a Nation, shall return to our established policy of a small Army and moderate Navy, and that in the future as in the past we shall rely chiefly for our defense on the volunteer. Let us pass this bill and thus proclaim to the citizenship of this land that to him who in the time of his country's need comes to its assistance his country in turn in the hour of his own or his family's need will be prompt to his or their assistance.

And let us be careful in these trying days not to be carried too far on the militaristic wave but, remembering the much that has already been accomplished in the two Hague conferences in the direction of the peaceful settlement of international disputes, while other nations are under the maddening influence of war retain our equilibrium and, awaiting the close of the present madness, be ready to urge the convening of the third Hague conference, at which let us hope further progress shall be made in the direction of permanent peace among the nations of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Mr. Chairman, if I may have the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY], I notice that the penalty for violating this section is not more than $500 fine, or two years' imprisonment in the penitentiary, and the offense is described as a misdemeanor. Congress, in the adoption of the Criminal Code, has defined a misdemeanor and a felony. Any offense which is punishable by imprisonment for a term longer than one year is described to be a felony. Otherwise it is a misdemeanor. This is contrary to the Criminal Code. I merely suggest this in order that it may not create confusion. Of course Congress has a right to adopt this as it stands, but it is an inconsistency between the Criminal Code and the penalty provided in the section, and it might result in confusion in the trial of criminal cases, especially with reference to the challenges allowed to a defendant. For instance, he has 10 challenges in a felony and less than that in a misdemeanor. The Criminal Code says that an offense punishable by imprisonment for more than a year is a felony. What is the judge going to say when he comes to determine whether this is a felony or a misdemeanor on the point of the number of challenges that the defendant may have? I suggest that to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I will say to the gentleman that this part of the bill, section 2, was copied almost verbatim from the act of June 27, 1890.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. That does not alter the facts I have just stated. I suggest to the gentleman why not strike out "two years" and make it "one year"? It seems to me that one year is enough.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. If the gentleman will offer an amendment, it will be accepted by the committee.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Then I move to strike out the words "two years" and insert the words "one year."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 19, strike out the words "two years" and insert in lieu thereof the words "one year."

The amendment was agreed to.

[Mr. JAMES addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have read this bill. It is a liberal one. Under existing conditions, without regard to what has been the pension policy of Congress for 50 years, I shall vote for it. As I read the bill, if a soldier dies and his widow does not have $250 a year or its equivalent, she is entitled to a pension. She does not have to trace the soldier's death to his service.

The widow of a soldier of the Civil War, who married her husband after 1890, before she can be pensioned must trace his death to the Army service, in most cases an impossibility after the lapse of over 50 years. While the policy of the United States has been to care for its soldiers and their widows and orphans, and will no doubt continue to do so and ought to continue, as an amendment is not in order upon this bill to care for the widows of the soldiers of the War for the Union, I hope there will be an opportunity given to the House at an early date to consider such a bill.

Muck-raking magazines and people who are opposed to pensions have talked about the bawd marrying the old soldier. Perhaps in some instances that may happen; but I think I have the greatest soldier district in Illinois, and that means perhaps the greatest soldier district in the United States, and I am acquainted with many of them, and with many widows who married soldiers since 1890, and I am here to say that when they talk about unworthy women having married soldiers to get their pensions when the old soldier died, it is the exception and not the rule that they are talking about. [Applause.]

We had no aid for a long time for a widow of a soldier of the War for the Union where she could not trace his death to Army service. If I recollect, in the year 1890 we provided that she might have a pension if she had an income of less than $100. A little later on that was increased, I think, to $250. I am not complaining of or opposing this bill from that standpoint, but I belong to a passing generation and I will be pardoned when I say that after passing this bill we will not be proud of ourselves, we will not be true to the whole population unless we pass a bill that covers the widows of soldiers who had the service of 90 days and longer. [Applause.] Many bills are pending before the Committee on Invalid Pensions. Let us hear from that committee with a favorable report and give the House a chance to act.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] who just took his seat was slightly inaccurate in his reference to the provisions of this bill. The limitation of the benefits in the bill is to those who have a net income of less than $250 per annum, not $250 worth of property. Now, I think there is force in the objection which the gentleman from Illinois makes to the bill, that it is not general enough, and ought to apply to all widows and orphans in the country to be absolutely fair and impartial. Under the general pension laws now the widows and orphans of veterans of the Spanish-American War are entitled to pensions upon proof that the decedent's death was caused by injury or disease contracted in the service. On April 1, 1914, I made some observations upon a bill almost identical in its terms and effect with this bill, and I read those remarks upon that occasion, as they still express my sentiments:

This bill presents to every living man who enlisted in the United States Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, Volunteer and Regular, and who was enrolled for 90 days between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, a paid-up contract of life insurance, which obligates the United States to pay upon his death to his widow, if her net income is less than $250 per annum, the sum of $12 per month for the remainder of her natural life or until she remarries, and to each of his children the sum of $2 per month until they become 16 years of age. He may have been home on a furlough during the entire period of his enlistment, but he gets the contract just the same if he was enrolled for 90 days. In case the child is insane, idiotic, or otherwise permanently helpless, the pension continues during the child's life or disability.

I believe that the financial obligation which the Government incurs to the men who enlist in its Army and Navy, both in war and in peace, outside of the contract of enlistment, is to indemnify them and their dependents for the money loss which results from such service, and this the Government has already done by general laws.

To undertake to pay in money for the risk assumed and for deeds of valor and heroism, or even for pain and suffering resulting from disease and injury which did not impair the earning power of the soldier, is to embark upon a sea of expenditures which has no limit except the uncontrolled discretion of Members of Congress, who are under the constant pressure of influential constituents whose political support they are naturally desirous of obtaining, and this subjects Members to the ever-present temptation of trading their votes on the floor of this House for political support in their districts; in other words, exchanging public money for votes.

When this bill was under consideration a week ago to-day, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] prefaced his remarks in opposition to the bill by the statement that there were a large number of Spanish War veterans in his district, and that he could probably best promote his political fortunes by remaining silent, whereupon the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] inquired, sotto voce, "Why don't you keep still, then?" to which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] replied in effect that he was constrained by a sense of public duty to oppose the bill.

Mr. Chairman, if this bill is brought in here as a mere vote-catching device, and support of it is urged on that ground, regardless of public considerations then we ought to amend it by including all persons who have served in the Regular or Volunteer Army for any period of time, or by including within the purview of its benefits every qualified elector. I have too much respect for the Members of this House to believe that they are so regardless of their oaths of office, so lost to all sense of propriety and decency, as to disregard public considerations in appropriating money out of the Public Treasury; if the Members of this House are unwilling to assume the responsibility of enacting into law a bill granting a pension to any officer or enlisted man during the period covered by the bill, other than those who incurred permanent injury or disease in the service, they can not justify their votes for this bill.

A serious objection to this bill is that it is impossible to determine even approximately the cost of the bill to this country. The Interior Department estimates the cost for the first year at $2,500,000, and an annual increase of this amount for an indefinite period. The bill applies to all soldiers who married up to the date of the final enactment of the bill into law and to children born of such marriage prior or subsequent thereto, so that it grants pensions to a generation of children yet unborn without any proof that the death of the husband and father was or may be the result of disease or injury contracted in the service. For these reasons I shall be constrained to oppose the enactment of the bill into law.

By an act of the General Assembly of Ohio, approved May 9, 1913, a mother's pension law was enacted authorizing the payment to the mother of $15 per month for one child and $7 per month for each additional child, under the terms and conditions of said act, which includes practically all widows with one or more children who are made beneficiaries under this bill, until said child or children become of age for legal employment.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, referring to the remarks of my colleague Mr. CANNON in reference to a bill for the pensioning of widows of Civil War veterans, I think I may say that the Committee on Invalid Pensions now has under consideration such a bill. I am hoping that it may very soon be brought into this House and passed. There are many deserving widows of Union soldiers who have been married since the 27th day of June, 1890, and who have lived with and cared for their soldier husbands for a period of 25 years, or until the death of their husbands, and they ought to be pensioned. I am in favor of this bill that is now pending before the House to pension the widows of Spanish War veterans. I believe that in caring for our volunteer soldiers, in any war, we are doing as much for preparedness, for national defense in the future as we can possibly do in any other manner. Let it be understood that when the young men of this land volunteer to defend the flag of our country and fight for our institutions, if they suffer loss of health and strength, that their care and comfort shall be a sacred charge upon the Government; that the Government will not only take care of them, but that if they lose their lives in defense of our flag——

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER (continuing). Or by reason of their service for the country, their widows shall be taken care of by this great Government of ours. Let that, now and forever, be understood to be a national policy, and thereby we shall be doing more in the way of preparation for future national defense and encouragement to defend our flag than we can do in any other possible way. [Applause.] Better than battleships and armament, better than a great Navy or a great Army, is the patriotism of the people and the knowledge that the Government will fittingly recognize every sacrifice made by its loyal defenders.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield to me right at that point?

Mr. FULLER. I will if I have the time.

Mr. GORDON. Is not that the general law now, what the gentleman has just stated?

Mr. FULLER. The general law now does not cover the case of widows of Civil War soldiers who were married to their husbands after the 27th day of June, 1890, unless the soldier dies of disabilities incurred in the service, which at this late day it is impossible to prove. The general law does not cover a case that is provided for in this bill, or that would be covered by the bill. I think that it ought to pass, as a fitting recognition of the service of those who volunteered and risked their health and their lives in the service of the country. [Applause.] But if this bill ought to pass, as I think it should, even more ought we to provide for the widows of Civil War veterans who cared for their soldier husbands in their declining years, and many of whom are now left destitute. A great and rich country can afford to care for its defenders and their widows and orphans. Justice requires it, and it is a wise national policy, which promotes patriotism, and which, if need be, in the future will cause the youth of the land to gladly offer their services to the country in every time of need. I do not regard the money paid in pensions as being wasted. Every dollar of it goes into circulation, and its benefits are not alone to the pensioner, but is felt in every community in the land. Soldiers, as a rule, do not accumulate wealth. Too often their widows are left destitute and dependent. A great Government like ours has a sacred duty to care for them in their time of need. We should be just and generous as well, and by our votes see to it that no Union soldier and no widow of a Union soldier shall ever suffer want or become a public charge. This bill, and the one I hope to see brought in to pension widows of Civil War soldiers, should pass by a unanimous vote. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, leave will be granted. There was no objection.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman has another bill to call up, the motion would be that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill H. R. 655——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the committee can not call up another bill now without reporting this bill. We do not go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union by motion, but we go in automatically on a particular bill.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, that is the reason I moved a moment ago that the committee rise.

Mr. MANN. And then after the House has acted on the bill the gentleman can call up the other bill.

Mr. KEATING. The motion to lay the bill aside was the Chairman's suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill favorably.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. HARRISON having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 54 and directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I desire a separate vote on amendment No. 1, amendment No. 2, and then I shall ask a division of the question on amendment No. 3. Those are the amendments which restrict the bill to a certain class of Regular soldiers. Now, I only want a vote on one of those questions, but I ask that all three be reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts reserves for a separate vote amendment No. 1, amendment No. 2, and amendment No. 3, with a division of the question on amendment No. 3.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. But, Mr. Speaker, I demanded the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts has a right to have a separate vote on any amendment.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. But we have not had a vote on the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment?

Mr. MANN. Let us dispose of the demand for the previous question first.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 3, at the end of the line insert the word "volunteer."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Also the following committee amendment was reported:

Page 1, lines 5 and 6, strike out the words "either as a regular or volunteer."

The amendment was agreed to.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 1, line 10, insert at the end of the line the following:
"Including all furloughs, or any officer or enlisted man of the Regular Establishment who rendered 90 days or more actual military or naval service in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection or in China between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, inclusive."

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that that question, as it contains two substantive propositions, one of which I do not object to, "including all furloughs," and the other restricting the pensions to certain classes of soldiers' widows, be divided between the word "furloughs" and the word "or," in the first line on page 2.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is first on the amendment in line 10, page 1, and beginning line 1, page 2, to include "all furloughs."

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GORDON. I wish to inquire whether or not this proposed amendment is not inconsistent with the one just adopted?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman that that question is not for the Chair. It is an amendment that was agreed to by the committee, and the question is on agreeing to that committee amendment.

Mr. GORDON. I make the point of order that it is not in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The question is on agreeing to the first part of the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the second part of the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there are several other amendments that have not been reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second vote demanded on any other of the committee amendments? [After a pause.] If not, the Chair will put them en gross. The question is on agreeing to the remaining committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KEY of Ohio, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER resumed the chair.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House be given permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that all Members of the House have permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the bill just passed. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. On the bill just passed?

Mr. AYRES. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FARR, Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania, Mr. BRITT, and Mr. RICKETTS were granted leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the bill H. R. 54.

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a short article written by Dr. Sidney L. Gulick on the immigration problem.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an article written by Dr. Gulick on the subject of immigration. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PENSION FOR SURVIVORS OF INDIAN WARS.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 655.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio calls up the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 655) to pension the survivors of certain Indian wars from 1865 to January, 1891, inclusive, and for other purposes.

Accordingly the House automatically resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of the bill H. R. 655, with Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 655, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 655) to pension the survivors of certain Indian wars from 1865 to January, 1891, inclusive, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions, limitations, and benefits of an act entitled "An act granting pensions to survivors of the Indian wars of 1832 to 1842, inclusive, known as the Black Hawk War, Creek War, Cherokee disturbances, and the Seminole War," approved July 27, 1892, as amended on February 19, 1913, be, and the same are hereby, extended from the date of the passage of this act to the surviving officers and enlisted men, including militia and volunteers of the military service of the United States, who have reached the age of 62 years, and who served for 90 days in the campaign in southern Oregon and Idaho and northern parts of California and Nevada from 1865 to 1868, inclusive; the campaign against the Cheyennes, Arapahoes, Kiowas, and Comanches in Kansas, Colorado, and Indian Territory from 1867 to 1869, inclusive; the Modoc War of 1872 and 1873; the campaign against the Apaches of Arizona in 1873; the campaign against the Kiowas, Comanches, and Cheyennes in Kansas, Colorado, Texas, Indian Territory, and New Mexico in 1874 and 1875; the campaign against the Northern Cheyennes and Sioux in 1876 and 1877; the Nez Perce War of 1877; the Bannock War of 1878; the campaign against the Northern Cheyennes in 1878 and 1879; the campaign against the Ute Indians in Colorado and Utah, from September, 1879, to November, 1880, inclusive; the campaign against the Apache Indians in Arizona in 1885 and 1886; and the campaign against the Sioux Indians in South Dakota from November, 1890, to January, 1891, inclusive; and also to include the surviving widows of said officers and enlisted men who shall have married said survivor prior to the passage of this act: Provided, That such widows have not remarried: Provided further, That where there is no record of enlistment or muster into the service of the United States in any of the wars mentioned in this act, the record of pay by the United States shall be accepted as full and satisfactory proof of such enlistment and service: And provided further, That all contracts heretofore made between the beneficiaries under this act and pension attorneys and claim agents are hereby declared null and void.

SEC. 2. That the period of service performed by beneficiaries under this act shall be determined by reports from the records of the War Department, where there is such a record, and by the reports from the records of the Treasury Department showing payment by the United States where there is no record of regular enlistment or muster into the United States military service.

SEC. 3. That section 4716 of the Revised Statutes, relating to loyalty during the Civil War, is hereby repealed so far as the same relates to this act or to pensioners under this act.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, under the new rule we have two hours for general debate. I would like to know who will be recognized for the hour in opposition to this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anyone who desires to be recognized in opposition to the bill?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I ask that, Mr. Chairman, in order that we may arrange for general debate.

Mr. MANN. There is no use of making any arrangement.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING].

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to pension the veterans of the Indian wars in the West and Southwest and the widows of such veterans. It is an extension of the act of July 27, 1892, as amended February 19, 1913. That act and the amendment to it pensioned the survivors of the Black Hawk War, the Creek War, the Cherokee disturbances, and the Seminole War. This bill seeks to extend the provisions of that act to the veterans of the Indian wars in the West.

The War Department gives us the history of 12 Indian campaigns fought between 1865 and 1892. In connection with the wearing of the "service-in-war chevrons" by enlisted men, the War Department conducted an investigation of the Indian campaigns of the West, and decided that 12 of those conflicts were of sufficient importance to be described as "wars," and those 12 campaigns are mentioned in the pending bill. The committee felt that it should limit the benefits of this legislation to the men who had taken part in those "wars." As a matter of fact, from 1865 to 1892 there were scores of conflicts between Regular and Volunteer troops and Indians in the far West. Many of these conflicts were of considerable importance, but, according to the War Department, they did not rise to the dignity of "wars."

In previous legislation dealing with the pensioning of survivors of Indian wars, Congress has undertaken to say that any man who served 30 days in such wars should receive a pension. The Committee on Pensions of this House felt that the pending legislation should be more conservative, so we have fixed the limit of 90 days' actual service in certain specified campaigns. Therefore, in order to secure the benefits of this act a man must have been in one or more of the recognized campaigns for at least 90 days. In addition to that he must be 62 years of age.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him at that point?

Mr. KEATING. Certainly.

Mr. SHERWOOD. While the gentleman is on that question can he tell us how many are involved?

Mr. KEATING. It will be impossible to say just how many will be affected by this bill. The War Department is unable to give us exact figures. This we know: The number of men involved in each of these campaigns was comparatively small, sometimes five or six hundred. I think the greatest number mentioned in the reports of the War College in one campaign was something like 2,500.

Mr. JAMES. What was the approximate number of men, the total number of men, engaged in all those campaigns?

Mr. KEATING. The War Department was unable to fix the exact number, or at least did not fix it.

Mr. JAMES. Can the gentleman tell us about how many?

Mr. KEATING. It is difficult to give an accurate estimate of that. I suppose that in the 12 campaigns not more than 20,000 or 25,000 men were involved. That is my impression. At any rate, the War Department records do not furnish the committee with the exact information.

Mr. JAMES. How many soldiers' widows does the gentleman think would be covered by this bill?

Mr. KEATING. I can not say, but I will insert in the RECORD the following letter from Mr. C. R. Hauser, of Denver, secretary and treasurer of the National Indian War Veterans' Association, which will give us the latest and most reliable data on the question of the number of beneficiaries under this bill:

DENVER, COLO., February 13, 1916.

Hon. EDWARD KEATING, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Upon reading a statement regarding the placing on the pension rolls of surviving Indian war veterans in this morning's Denver Post—said statement placing the number of men who will become beneficiaries under the bill at 5,000—I will say that I consider this number greatly overestimated. It may have held good some five years ago when the movement to pension Indian war veterans was initiated, but since then a very great number of these ex-soldiers have passed away. According to the records of this order a good 25 per cent of its original members have died since that time.

Omitting survivors of Indian wars which occurred prior to 1865, a few of whom are undoubtedly yet living, and commencing with the number of men who served in the Army on the frontiers about the years 1866 and 1867, as near as can at this time be learned, there were not over 2,500 men in the field. Estimating the age of the average man at 25 years, and adding the 49 years which have since then elapsed, we find that a survivor would to-day be 74 years of age. It can safely be asserted that not over 10 per cent of these men are living to-day, thus making their number about 250 men. I consider this a most liberal estimate, and doubt very much whether one-half of this number will ever make application for the relief that this bill when passed will give them.

In the campaigns in Idaho, Oregon, and southern California from 1865 to 1868, while the regular forces were augmented by various volunteer companies, there were at no time over 1,000 men in the field. While statements regarding the ages of men in the regular service holds good also in this case, it is equally certain that the ages of the men who participated during these campaign in volunteer companies were always greater, making a perfect surety of the fact that not more than 10 to 15 per cent survive to-day, leaving about 150 men.

The campaigns of 1868 to 1869 against the Cheyennes, Arapahoes, Kiowas, and Comanches in Kansas, Colorado, and Indian Territory saw in actual service about 2,000 United States soldiers, assisted by two regiments of Kansas Volunteer Cavalry, making a total of about 3,000 men. Forty-six years have passed since the closing of these campaigns. It is safe to say that not over 15 per cent of the men who served in them are with us to-day, making the number of survivors between 400 and 450 men.

The Modoc War of 1872 to 1873 saw, according to all researches available, about 700 men in the field. A period of 43 years has since passed, making survivors at least 67 years of age. At a very liberal estimate not over 200 of these men are living to-day.

The Apache War of 1872 to 1875 was participated in by approximately 1,500 soldiers. These men were a little younger in years, but as 40 years have since gone by and we calculate the men's average age while then in the service at 23 years, it would make a survivor about 63 years of age, so that a very generous estimate would leave in the neighborhood of 300 men.

The various campaigns against the Sioux and their allies, from 1875 to 1879, saw the greatest number of United States soldiers in active field operations. The number of men engaged can be placed at about 4,000 to 5,000 men. While the extraordinary hard services during these expeditions resulted in the early death of a very great number of their participants, we can yet place the number of men yet alive, estimated on a 25 per cent basis, at about 1,000 men.

The campaign against the Ute Indians in Colorado, 1879 to 1880, required the services of about 2,000 soldiers. These men may also be counted as having been about 23 years of age. While some of them would as yet not become beneficiaries under the wording of the bill, yet estimating a very liberal 25 per cent, this would give only 500 men.

The campaigns in Arizona, 1885 to 1886, and the campaigns against the Sioux in 1890 to January, 1891, while requiring the field services of 1,500 United States soldiers, will not greatly increase the number of pensioners under the wording of the bill at this time. The most of these soldiers were men of 21 to 25 years of age. As 25 to 31 years have passed since these campaigns closed, the most of the surviving men are now but from 50 to 56 years of age, so that they would not become beneficiaries under the wording of the bill for several years.

While I candidly admit that I may be in error in estimating the number of troops engaged in the various campaigns, I am quite positive that if I have made a miscalculation in the number of survivors the error has been in overestimating them. I do not think that any other man has had a better chance to figure on this proposition than I have had during the time that I have served as the national secretary of the National Indian War Veterans' Association.

Very respectfully, yours,

C. R. HAUSER,
National Secretary National Indian War Veterans.

Mr. Chairman, a number of Members from the Western States are anxious to speak on this measure, and I am disposed to give way to them for the time being, and under the five-minute rule I shall undertake to answer any questions that may be asked.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the gentleman who has charge of the bill why the committee has fixed the length of service at 90 days, especially in view of the fact that the information received from the War Department indicates that while some of these engagements were very short, they were very spirited, some killed and many wounded? That was especially true with reference to the Nez Perces War. We have in Idaho a number of Indian war veterans who participated for about 30 days in that campaign, and some of them were very badly wounded, and yet under the provisions of this bill, although they were regularly enlisted, they did not have actual service for the length of time provided and would not have a pensionable status. It seems to me that an injustice will be done them by fixing the limit at 90 days.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Would they not come in under the general law?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. No; they were not in the regular service.

Mr. KEATING. I think if it can be proved that the soldier was in the regular service of the United States there would be no difficulty in getting him a pension, provided his disability was the result of his service.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It would not give his widow a pensionable status, though.

Mr. KEATING. Oh, yes. If his death resulted from his service. As I was saying, the committee wanted to be as conservative as possible. I think every man in the West would like to make this legislation as liberal as possible, and yet it is not a case of what the westerners would like to do. It is what Congress is disposed to do at this time.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. But you have no way to test the feeling of Congress unless you submit an amendment reducing the time from 90 days to 60 days or 30 days.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Colorado will permit me, I am familiar with the campaigns referred to in Nevada, and also with the Modoc War. Is there any particular reason why the limit of service is set at 90 days? Would it make any material difference as to the number of claimants if it were reduced to 30 days?

Mr. KEATING. Yes; it would make a very material difference.

Mr. RAKER. Can the gentleman give me an approximation of the difference it would make?

Mr. KEATING. I should say that if you reduced it from 90 days to 30 days it would double the number of pensioners; and in addition to that, gentlemen, we insist through our pension laws that veterans of the Civil War shall have served 90 days.

Mr. RAKER. May I put another question to the gentleman?

Mr. KEATING. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. There is a case in my mind where the parties were watching and waiting and guarding their homes every day for two or three or five months, but their actual service lasted only for 35 or 40 days. Their service was severe, and it was successful, but those men will not get recognition under the bill. They feel that there ought to be some provision whereby, although they served only 30 days, they could receive the benefits of this act, because they gave to the cause their time and attention and thought for months prior to their actual service. They devoted months to watching and waiting, and then, when called into active service, they made it successful and got results, and still they would get no relief under this bill. However, the bill is good and ought to be passed, even though we may not be able to reduce the time limit to 30 days.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. KEATING. Certainly.

Mr. SLOAN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he can inform the committee how long the Sioux War, in South Dakota, in the winter of 1890 and 1891 lasted?

Mr. KEATING. According to the War Department's findings, the campaign began in November, 1890, and continued until some time in January, 1891, covering November, December, and January.

Mr. SLOAN. If a man enlisted for the full period of that war he would be shut out from the provisions of this bill.

Mr. KEATING. Unless he could show service in some one of the other campaigns.

Mr. SLOAN. In addition to that—that is, two services.

Mr. KEATING. He would have to patch up his service so as to make 90 days.

Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the Committee on Pensions, I desire to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES].

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, the bill that we passed a short time ago regarding Spanish War veterans is far more liberal than this. I can not be accused of saying anything against the Spanish War veterans on the ground that I am opposed to soldiers or to Spanish War veterans, because I had the honor of belonging to the Thirty-fourth Michigan, and we were one of the first regiments that went to Cuba. But I do claim that we have no right to pass a bill like the one we have just passed, requiring, you may say, only 15 days' actual service, because under that bill—the Key bill—a man could have spent 75 days on furlough and 15 days on kitchen detail in the camp, while under this bill a man must have seen 90 days' actual service. If we are asked why they had to serve 90 days under this bill and only 30 days under the other one, the only reason I can see is that the Spanish War veterans have more political pull. Some of the members of the Spanish War veterans have degenerated into a political machine. They not only admit it, but they claim it. A short time ago I read of a case where some of the Spanish War veterans claimed that they were responsible for the defeat for a judgeship of the supreme court of the State of New York of one of the most respected members of this House [Mr. FITZGERALD] because he had voted against the Key bill. I belong to the Society of the Santiago and Spanish War Veterans and am a charter member and was first adjutant of each. As soon as these bills were introduced I sent copies of them to my district and asked them for their opinion. These bills were copied in the papers, with a statement of my reasons for not voting for them. I have not received a single resolution, telegram, or letter protesting against the fact that I intended to speak and vote against the bill which you have just passed. Neither have I had a telegram, a letter, or a resolution from any Spanish War veteran in my district asking me to vote for the bill. The claim has been made that the Spanish War veterans are asking nothing for themselves. In the next session of Congress you will see that there will be a bill introduced pensioning every Spanish-American War veteran, whether or not he saw service, whether or not he left his country, whether he is wealthy or poor.

The Spanish War veterans in my district believe the same as I do, that if I die my widow and children will be taken care of by this Government if they need it, and I believe that the sentiment in my district among the Spanish War veterans is not any different than in any other district in this country. We are not of the opinion that in order to get volunteers for the next war it is necessary to pension every man who enlisted in 1898. We are more concerned that this country pay attention to preparing for war, so that the volunteers in the next war will not suffer with malaria as we did. I, in common with many of my comrades, know what it is to weigh 150 pounds on a certain date, and 60 days after to weigh 90 pounds with my clothes on.

But we are entitled to no credit for this. We did what any red-blooded American will do; and I speak for my comrades in Michigan when I say that not only did we enlist in 1898 but we would enlist again. We are more concerned that the honor of this country shall be upheld than we are with pensions.

The other day the first man to answer the call of the martyred President Lincoln for 75,000 volunteers in 1861 was buried. In delivering the funeral oration one of his best friends said, in part, as follows:

> We hear much of the peace-at-any-price sacrifice. Peace with honor; yes. Peace to the honor of our country; yes. But if it means that we are to be the prey of international ambition; if it means that we are to do the bidding of every nation on earth, and that our flag must dip in disgrace, then we must not have peace. No nation can be weak to-day in preparedness and strong to-morrow in efficiency.

If sharing these sentiments gives a man the right to call himself a patriotic American citizen, then the Spanish War veterans in my district and myself are patriotic Americans. But if believing that patriotism consists in no personal sacrifice yourself, if it means voting money for pensions to the worthy and unworthy alike, the rich and poor alike, and that this counts for more than answering your country's call, then we are not patriotic American citizens. [Applause.]

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, to my mind this is one of the meritorious pension bills to be acted upon by the House. Possibly but few Members of the House in their early days lived in the Indian country, or were acquainted with those who participated in Indian fights, and thereby made it possible for civilization to exist. I am not one of those who hold the Indian entirely responsible for all the depredations that were committed. A great part of what he did was in following the example of the white man in the first instance. But nevertheless we had this trouble, we had these Indians, and we had the old pioneers to settle this thing.

One who is familiar with the general conditions must recognize that in most of these cases the trouble arose on the frontier, where there were but few settlements, far apart, and where, without the Indians, all the hardships of life were to be encountered.

The question of length of service as provided in the bill is what I want to direct attention to. In that country every man maintained an equipment to defend himself and his neighbors. He furnished his own gun, he furnished his own ammunition, and he was prepared at any moment and alert at all times, and in constant communication with his neighbors, because of the danger that was always present in the frontier country where the Indians were. When trouble came it came like a flash. A man had to give active service. He had to leave his family at home to be taken care of as best they might, and to run the risk of another skulking band of Indians coming in from the other direction and destroying his family and depriving him of his dear ones while he was absent. He had none of the equipment, commissary or otherwise, that soldiers of the Regular Army had; but he did know how to fight the roving bands of Indians, to fight them with their own methods, and it was by those methods, by going out in the open, by making a bold stand, that he was able to succeed in these fights. In 10 or 15 days, and sometimes less, more work was done and more hardships encountered, then and in the previous time of readiness, than might have been incurred by service for five or six months or even longer in the Regular Army or even in the Spanish-American War.

I hope that when the committee arrives at that part of the bill where the question of limitation of time is provided for, that it will see its way clear to change it to 30 days and to give to these pioneers some recognition for the services they performed for this country in making the frontier habitable and possible for settlement. The wife was then the wife of the soldier, if the soldier is dead, should be given the same consideration. She was a part of that frontier settlement, of that frontier hardship, and her assistance helped make it possible for her husband to leave home and family, to meet his neighbors and friends, and to go and maintain the peace and order that should be maintained in a community where these disturbances occurred.

In the instances provided for in the bill, the one time in eastern Nevada bordering on the eastern side of California, those farmers I have had the pleasure of knowing for the last 30 years voluntarily assisted the few soldiers, and everyone of them left his home, took his rifle on his shoulder, and went out, and in about 35 days they made a successful campaign, conquering the Indians, and from that time to this we have had no trouble. Of those 60 men who went into that fight there remain but 6, and the widows of the others ought to be given consideration.

The same with regard to the Modoc Indian War in the northern part of California and the southern part of Oregon. Among the volunteers great work was done with little loss of life. It was done by virtue of the effective work of those volunteers in connection with those of the Regular Army, by virtue of their knowledge of the country, by virtue of their heroism, and by virtue of the fact that they were fighting for their homes, and now all they ask is that they should be given recognition for that service.

During this fight, after it had gone on in a desultory way for three or four weeks, they had arranged a peace conference with Gen. Canby, Dr. Thomas, Mr. Meeker, and Mr. Dyer. Capt. Jack and his friends were to meet in conference and settle the trouble. They met. Capt. Jack with his Indians were all prepared, and hid their guns in the bush. He recognized that 20 years before the white man came to his country, and after having a battle with them, they then had a peace conference, and at that peace conference the white man had hid his guns, and when they got the Indians where they wanted them they killed all except Capt. Jack, who was then a young man, and he escaped with his life. In turn the lesson taught him by the white man was carried out by Capt. Jack at this peace conference with Gen. Canby in 1873. Gen. Canby, Dr. Thomas, and others were killed at that time. That, of course, brought on a general conflict between the Indians and the white men, and after some three weeks or longer, fighting with the volunteers from southern Oregon and northern California, they were able to surround and capture the Indians, and Capt. Jack was arrested and sent into a State in the East, and he was returned about a year and a half ago to his old territory, where he died.

These men ought to be given a pension for the service of 30 days, for actual service, the same as the man who was enlisted for 90 days or 100 days, but whose service was only 1 or 2 days in actual service.

The chairman of the committee has stated that the only question is as to the extra expense that might be incurred by virtue of making it 30 days; but I will venture to say that in practically all of the Indian wars—and there are only about three after 1873——

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I think that is all.

Mr. RAKER. You will find that, as in the Modoc War, in the Surprise Valley Indian War, and others, over 80 per cent of the participants of these wars have passed and gone, and not only the participants but their widows. Of the 60 men in my own home county, from an examination last fall, only 5 of these men are left to tell the tale. If that is a reasonable comparison as to the participants in the rest of the Indian fights, you will find that practically all of these old men are gone. This bill should pass, and I know it will. [Applause.]

[Mr. RAKER had leave to extend his remarks.]

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TAGGART].

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, this bill seeks to apply the pension act of July 27, 1892, with some modifications, to the survivors of Indian wars who served 90 days or more in certain campaigns, naming them, and is made to apply to the widows of those who took part in these wars under the conditions named.

It may be proper to call attention to the act of July 27, 1892, which I have before me. It provides that any of the surviving officers and enlisted men—including marines, militia, and volunteers—in the military or naval service who served 30 days in the Black Hawk Creek War, Cherokee disturbance, and the Florida War from 1832 to 1842, shall be placed on the pension roll. The original rate in this bill was $8 a month, and it goes on with certain provisions that must be complied with before a pension can be obtained.

The present bill requires a service of 90 days or more in these wars. The act of February 19, 1913, provides that the pensions of surviving soldiers of those wars, referring to the same wars as the act of 1892, shall be $20 a month, and will apply if this bill becomes a law.

This pension is comparatively small. The old Revolutionary soldiers were pensioned at $8 a month a hundred years ago. It was the last raise that they got, and one of those old men could take a dollar of that money at that time and a market basket and go down town and bring home more of the necessaries of life with that dollar than a man can bring home with $5 in 1916. The general pension law for widows provides for $12 a month for all widows, and this will apply.

I will take occasion to mention one or two of the organizations covered by this bill—the Eighteenth and the Nineteenth Kansas Cavalry. In the summer of 1867 four companies of cavalry were organized and mustered into the United States service for a period of four months. They were called the Eighteenth Kansas Cavalry. They immediately got into action and fought several battles with the Indians. They sustained the frightful ravages of cholera and several of them were killed. They were honorably mustered out after their four months' service and returned to their homes. A year later the Nineteenth Kansas Cavalry, a full regiment of 12 companies of men, were mustered into the United States service at the suggestion of the War Department for a period of six months. They were enrolled some time in October, 1868. They conducted a winter campaign in what was then the Indian Territory, and as far as Texas and in western Kansas, in the campaign against the Cheyennes, Arapahoes, Kiowas, and Comanches. It was an extremely severe and bitter winter. They were personally complimented by all of their commanders. They received the approbation of every officer under whom they served. They endured untold hardships. They bivouacked in the snow, and in an atmosphere below zero, during that terrible winter. It might perhaps appeal to some of those who are in the House when I say that sleeping under the same blankets in those two regiments were men who had served on opposite sides in the great war between the States, and when you pass this pension bill it will be perhaps the last and certainly one of the first opportunities you will have to grant a pension to men who served in the Confederate Army. Long ago all restrictions as to the pension laws on account of service in the Confederate Army were removed by Congress, except perhaps one, and that was enlistment after the 1st of January, 1865. This bill will grant to those who served in the Confederate Army as well as those who did not a pension that they deserve at the hands of this Government.

The Indian fighter did a work that will never have to be done again. He required a degree of courage that an ordinary enlistment in the Regular Army or in the volunteer service does not require. In the necessary clashes that had to come between civilization and savagery he stood between civilization and the savage tribes that were attacking it. He above all men is entitled to the thanks of the American people, to their gratitude, and to their remembrance. These are days when newspapers are full of talk about preparedness. I will not stop to talk about that now except to say this: That our best preparedness lies in the fact that at least 5,000,000 young men under this flag are prepared, perhaps not by military training, perhaps not by education in military schools, but by their patriotism to serve the country. They are prepared to enlist in the armies of the United States at the first call for volunteers. One reason for this at least is that the people of the United States have always appreciated their soldiers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Kansas yield to me for a moment?

Mr. TAGGART. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. I find that the bill fails to extend relief to certain parties whom I personally know did a great service in the Southwest. If the gentleman will examine the bill on the second page, beginning at line 2, he will find that its benefits are extended from the date of the passage of the act to the surviving officers and enlisted men, including militia and volunteers of the military service of the United States. Why is it that the Texas Rangers were left out of that category? They certainly did, to my personal knowledge, more fighting against the Indians and protected the frontier of that State as well as the Indian Territory more than any body of men on earth, according to their numbers, and why were they left out?

The gentleman can also answer another question I desire to ask. In line 9 I find are recited the campaigns against the Cheyennes, Arapahoes, the Kiowas, and the Comanches in Kansas, Colorado, and the Indian Territory. It is a fact known to all men everywhere who have been in that country or who have read the reports from the War Department that there was more fighting in the State of Texas than in all of the other places combined. Why is it that Texas has been left out of this category without any benefit either to her Rangers or the State?

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that I am not a member of the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I regret that fact, because I am sure if the gentleman were he would have seen that Texas had been given justice.

Mr. TAGGART. I am not here to explain the reason why certain things have been omitted from the bill.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAGGART. Yes.

Mr. MURRAY. I want to state to the gentleman from Texas that I am on the Pension Committee. I am not acquainted sufficiently with the various Indian wars to know what would be correct. I thought of the same thing of which the gentleman speaks. My father was one of the Texas Rangers, but I did not feel like interfering with the bill, and did not know enough about it to know to what extent it would be proper for Federal legislation to go. I believe the gentleman from Texas is correct.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will say to the gentleman I have a bill for this very purpose (H. R. 341), which seems to have received no attention, although I have been so very busy with my own committee I have not had time to take care of that bill. However, I shall certainly favor this bill, but I shall certainly fight for the passage of my bill, because it is exactly on all fours with this bill. If I tried to get it on as an amendment to this bill, it would be stricken out on the point of order. I serve notice that Texas must have her rights in these matters or else there will be quite a little row raised on the floor of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, I will simply say in reply to the gentleman from Texas, as I stated before, that I am not a member of the committee. I have heard of the very efficient, the very necessary, the very brave and gallant services rendered by the Texas Rangers in the Indian wars. I have the honor of having survivors of those men in my district. If I were a member of this committee I would have insisted on including them in the bill. In fact, it was the old policy of pensioning for services in Indian wars to include men who served in any organization. I say to the gentleman from Texas that I shall be glad to vote for any amendment that he has to offer that will place on the pension roll men who rendered service equivalent to the service that is mentioned by this bill, no matter in what organization they served.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, it is proposed with the legislation before the House to do belated justice to men who were engaged on the frontier in some of the most thrilling occurrences in American history. It is a peculiar fact that warfare on this continent and in this country affords the only illustration in all history of battles in which there were no survivors. Thermopylae had her messenger of defeat, but there was none from the Alamo; there was none from the field of Massacre Hill. It was a very wonderful series of campaigns——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment—that which began in 1866 with the attack on Fort Phil Kearney in the Big Horn Mountains and which closed with the campaign of Wounded Knee. I now yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman from Wyoming speaks of frontier warfare. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that when Texas went into the Union by one of the articles of annexation it was understood, specifically stated, that the frontier should be defended by the United States, and that that was one of the moving causes which impelled Texas to join the Union and become the great State that she is now? Texas protected not alone her frontier from Indians but from Mexico. Of course the Indians are now a past question, but we still have our Ranger force and they are defending our State at the present time, and why they have not been given relief I can not understand.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I will say to the gentleman I hope the gentleman from Texas does not want to tempt me to take up the Mexican question. [Applause.] I have discussed that at various times.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I only mention that in connection with what the gentleman said in order to show him that we have done it and are doing it at the present time.

Mr. MONDELL. If there were any forces engaged in frontier warfare in Texas that are not provided for in this bill they ought to be provided for, but I arose particularly for the purpose of calling attention to the fact, as I understand it, as I read the bill—perhaps it is my fault that I have not given the matter more attention prior to this time—but as I read the bill I think there are survivors of other important forces engaged in frontier warfare that are not cared for by the bill. I assume that it was the intent of the committee to bring within the provisions of the bill all of the survivors of those forces that were engaged—particularly where they were enrolled or paid under the United States—all that were engaged in Indian campaigns from about 1865 on. But I find no provision in this bill for those men who were engaged in those extremely bloody campaigns in Wyoming in 1866 which opened the Indian warfare that continued for something like 15 or 20 years. I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to a very curious mistake made by whoever drafted this historical résumé of Indian campaigns. On page 9 of the committee report, second column, this statement is made:

> It was in the latter part of 1866 that Col. Fetterman, with 3 commissioned officers, 76 enlisted men, and 2 civilians, were massacred about 4 miles from old Fort Laramie.

An extraordinary statement for an employee of the War Department to make. Old Fort Laramie was on the Platte River in the extreme southeastern part of Wyoming. Massacre Hill, where Col. Fetterman and his men were killed—one of the two battles in the history of the world from which there came no messenger of defeat—is located in the extreme northern part of Wyoming and about 4 miles from the site of old Fort Phil Kearney. This Congress reported a bill, which I introduced a good many years ago, placing a marker on that historical battle ground, and it seems to me very extraordinary that one preparing an official statement of this sort in the War Department, or whoever it was, should have fallen into such an egregious error of historical fact, a well-known historical fact. It was a campaign brought about by the fact that when the peace commissioners in 1865 made peace, or attempted to make peace, at Fort Laramie with the Sioux and allied nations some of the chiefs, led by Red Cloud, refused to join in the treaty, and they proceeded north into central Wyoming and eastern Dakota and harassed the forces which were sent north from Fort Laramie in the summer of 1865 to defend the trail leading into Montana.

A fort was established on Piney Creek in northern Wyoming, which was for 18 months under constant siege by Red Cloud and his warriors. During that siege occurred two of the most remarkable battles in all of the annals of warfare, the Battle of Massacre Hill, to which I have referred, and a very wonderful fight on Piney Creek known as the "wagon-box fight," the first engagement in which repeating arms were used against the Indians, and one of the very first occasions in which repeating arms were used anywhere in an engagement. In that very remarkable engagement some 37 men in a corral of wagon boxes taken from the freight wagons held off for an entire day the entire embattled Sioux Nation. Red Cloud had certainly no less than 2,500 warriors, and probably more, and they charged some 12 or 14 times on this little band of 37 men behind those wagon boxes in the valley of the Piney. The Indians were only driven off when relief forces came from Fort Phil Kearney, and only then because the Indians came to the conclusion that the soldiers gathered there must be armed with some mysterious weapon, the character of which they did not understand.

If those soldiers had been armed with anything but repeating rifles, they would have been overwhelmed by the first charge made by the Sioux. Now, that battle of Massacre Hill, the battle of the "wagon-box fight," on the Piney, and the later fight in the vicinity of Fort Reno were part of that opening campaign which is referred to in the first two paragraphs of this report.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SIMS). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. And yet I can not find that the soldiers of those campaigns are included in the provisions of this bill. There were some 2,000 troops, first and last, engaged in that campaign. They are certainly not the troops referred to as being in the campaign in southern Oregon, Idaho, California, and Nevada in 1865 to 1868. That was not the campaign against the Cheyennes, Arapahoes, Kiowas, and Comanches in Kansas, Colorado, and the Indian Territory, 1868 to 1869, inclusive, because those battles were all fought in Wyoming. They would not come under the head of the Modoc War or the war against the Apaches in Arizona, or the later campaign in Texas and Colorado against the Kiowas and Comanches, and I am wondering what provision of this bill or what designation of the bill includes the men of those commands.

I see my friend from Nebraska sitting here, who has a constituent who served, and with great heroism, through that very long and arduous campaign, and who is, I think, now the only survivor of the "wagon-box fight." I am afraid that very gallant soldier would not be pensioned under this bill, although I am sure it was the intent of the committee to include all of those.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. As I said in the opening statement made to the House, the committee adopted the definition of the term "Indian campaign" given us by the War Department. The War Department has catalogued 12 Indian campaigns. In addition to that, the officials of the National Indian War Veterans Association have gone over this bill——

Mr. MONDELL. I did not hear the last statement which the gentleman made.

Mr. KEATING. I say that the bill was passed on by the officers of the National Indian War Veterans Association, the only association of its kind, I believe, in the country, and they seem to think that these provisions were sufficiently broad to cover a majority of those who participated in Indian fighting in the West. At the suggestion of the officials of that association we adopted the War Department's definition of Indian campaigns.

Mr. MONDELL. If they were no more accurate than they are in placing the Battle of Massacre Hill in the vicinity of Fort Laramie, about 400 miles from where it actually occurred; if they are no more accurate in their definition of these campaigns than they are in that matter, I do not think their definitions are likely to cover all of the Indian campaigns. It is very clear that there is nothing in the various titles or designations of campaigns in the bill that specifically refer to that opening campaign which is emphasized in the first two paragraphs of the résumé to which I have referred. That was the first campaign after the close of the Civil War, general in character, and involving the great Sioux Nation and its allied tribes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has again expired.

Mr. MONDELL. And it was the most important of all of those early campaigns. And yet I can not see that those soldiers are provided for in the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. I had depended, as the gentleman from Colorado had, on the War Department and on the Association of Indian War Veterans for the drafting of a bill that would include all of these people. But it seems to me that the definition is faulty, as I understand some of the Indian campaigns, in several particulars. It does not include specifically any of the early fights along the Old Overland or Old Mormon Trail up the Platte, where there was a continuous attempt on the part of the Sioux to prevent immigration. I can not find any of these definitions under which the fights around Casper or old Fort Fetterman are clearly included. It would require a very broad construction of any of these provisions to include the campaign in which, as my friend from Nebraska reminds me, Lieut. Casper was killed near the present town of Casper on the North Platte. And clearly there is no description in the bill that would include the soldiers of that opening campaign which the report of the War Department particularly emphasizes, and which was in many respects the most arduous of that whole Indian warfare, which began when Red Cloud, carrying with him the main forces of the Sioux and Cheyennes, refused to abide by the peace treaty signed at Fort Laramie and took to the warpath.

There is no provision in the bill that specifically relates to the campaign referred to at length in this résumé, of pursuit of the Sioux and Cheyennes in the Tongue River country, although I presume they would be included in the words "the campaign against the Northern Cheyennes and Sioux in 1876 and 1877," though part of that campaign was in 1875, as I recall it. The battle on Tongue River was fought, I believe, in 1876. It is rather late, I admit, to call attention to these seeming omissions, and perhaps I should have given the matter attention earlier. But unless the bill is amended to some extent I fear some very deserving men will be left out.

Mr. TAGGART. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. It will not include, I fear, some men who were engaged—not many, because there are few survivors, but whatever survivors there are—in some exceedingly trying campaigns.

Mr. TAGGART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. TAGGART. Is it not a fact that the Pension Bureau has interpreted those words "Indian wars" or "campaigns" very broadly? For instance, if those two fights that the gentleman mentioned were part of a certain campaign against a tribe of Indians, would they not be included?

Mr. MONDELL. The difficulty is that there is no campaign described that by any reasonable construction would include those bloody campaigns in northern Wyoming in 1866 and 1867. They might be included if you did not name certain States in some of the other provisions. I am heartily in favor of the legislation, and hope it may be so amended as to be inclusive of all campaigns against Indians in the period referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I desire to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I favor the passage of this bill because it recognizes the meritorious service of some of the men who fought on the western frontiers against hostile Indians. They performed a distinguished service; they underwent great privations, and they are entitled to the same consideration with respect to pensions that Congress has heretofore given to the veterans of the Civil War.

Far be it from me to cast the slightest reflection upon the valiant servicse rendered by men in blue who saved the Union. The fame of their valor and prowess is fixed in history. They fought against men of their own race, equally valorous, and to whose courage all time will pay tribute. The leaders on both sides of the war between the States were the very flower of our civilization. They knew the meaning of honor and chivalry, and wherever possible they softened the rigors of war by acts of kindness and consideration for a fallen foe.

The veterans of the Indian wars dealt with an enemy who knew nothing and cared less for the rules of civilized warfare. He was a savage, not content with mere killing, but who took delight in torturing his prisoners in the most fiendish and revolting manner. The Indian warrior never came boldly to the attack unless supported by overwhelming numbers, but fought from ambush. Intimately acquainted with the country, skillful in his own kind of strategy, it was only by superhuman efforts that the American soldiers could ever capture him.

I have talked with many of these old Indian fighters, and they all tell the same tale of long marches over wild, rough country, of days and nights in the saddle without sleep, of hunger and thirst, in pursuit of Indians who scattered like quail before a hunter only to meet again at some distant place and there to commit new outrages. This was the kind of warfare that tried men's souls. The American soldiers prayer for a chance to get at their red enemies and settle the issue once and for all, but the wily and elusive Indian did not fight that way.

It was no war of the trenches, where the men on each side could pause to remember that Christ was born on Christmas day. No one ever heard of a white man and an Indian swapping tobacco across the lines. It was a war of civilization against savagery, and those who made possible the settlement of the West could look for nothing but treachery from their Indian foemen. Having fought the good fight, having borne the heat and burden of the day, these Indian war veterans are entitled to the same recognition from their Government that it has so generously bestowed on all of its other defenders.

My only objection to this bill is that it does not go far enough. Certain campaigns against Indians are designated as Indian wars, service in which entitles the survivor to a pension. I can see no justice in such a distinction. If any person rendered military service against hostile Indians he is entitled to the same consideration, whether the campaign was long or short, and it makes no difference whether some Secretary of War has dignified it by calling it an Indian war. If I had my way about it, I would pension every man who served for more than 30 days in the Indian wars or campaigns against hostile Indians from the close of the Civil War to the outbreak of the Spanish War. And I would pension the widows of such soldiers.

I would also recognize the invaluable service rendered by the friendly Indians who enlisted as scouts and soldiers in the United States Army. But for their skill and knowledge of Indian warfare it is doubtful if the wild Indian could have ever been conquered. They were the first of their race to recognize that civilization must supplant barbarism, and they lent a helping hand when help was sorely needed. These old Indians should not be forgotten when Congress enacts any bill to pension the veterans of the Indian wars.

Look at the West to-day; that great country beyond the Mississippi and the Missouri, now the home of millions of our citizens and the seat of a civilization that can not be equaled in all the earth. Yet 50 years ago none but the hardiest pioneers dared enter that land, and they went armed to the teeth. If it had not been for the veterans whose cause we now plead, the early settlers would have been driven from the country by the Indians and the far West would still be known as the great American desert.

Meager and grudging as it is, I shall vote for this bill, because it will bring some relief to a few brave men who by their valor helped to establish civilization in the West, and who are, therefore, entitled to compensation from the Government in their declining years. [Applause.]

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Illinois can use some of his time now, I shall be glad.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can use some of his time now.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, as I announced before, I subscribe to the justice of the doctrine and the wholesome policy of paying pensions to the surviving veterans of our past wars. If there are any that are more meritorious than others, we must admit they are the Indian war veterans. They were always ready. They had to be ready. They did not have a hospital corps, or medical supplies, or any other thing to treat the wounded or the sick. They had to furnish for the most part their own mounts. They had to furnish their own ammunition, particularly in the beginning.

Indeed, I remember when but a boy living on the frontier of Texas, where my good friend from Texas, Mr. STEPHENS, then a struggling young lawyer, lived, when he and others of the Texas Rangers, including my father, had to go to the Red River and push back the Comanches and Arapahoes. At the same time the Indians of the Five Civilized Tribes had to aid the rangers in holding the Comanches and Arapahoes in check. Every bright moonlight night these raids occurred, unexpectedly oftentimes, as one occurred in the school community where I lived, where one of the boys going home from school was scalped. Men, women, and children were murdered by these roving bands. I, like the gentleman from Texas, believe that this portion ought to be in the bill, although I confess I am a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, but did not look after it because I had too important other fish to fry on the Indian Committee.

Even the Indian himself will tell you how important these fighters were, including the cowboys. Their conception of the importance of the cowboys is illustrated by a story told of an Indian out in the district of my friend from Oklahoma, Mr. FERRIS, where an Indian went to the Anadarko Indian Agency to ask for a gun. The agent said to him, "What do you want with a gun? You might shoot a soldier." "Oh," said the Indian, "me kill a soldier with a stick. Me want the gun to shoot cowboy; to shoot Texas Ranger." That was the Indian's conception, due largely, I think, to the fact that the Indian Bureau at that time was under the War Department, and naturally, as they should have done, they sought to avoid every conflict possible by restricting the use of guns.

But the men who civilized the West were these old Indian fighters, many of them cowboys on the range and plains settlers. They went through all these hardships, of course, fighting for a home; but they made it possible for those Territories to blossom. They made it possible to open up farms, to increase the wealth of this country, and but for them it could not have been done.

This is a very late hour at which to begin to remember their services, but I am sure that every man who lives in the West who has become the beneficiary of their service will be glad of this recognition of it, though late, and I am sure that every man in the East who lived in dread of an invasion by savage Indians will refrain from objecting to this late recognition of the merits and services of the Indian fighters. They have never clamored around Congress; they have never had organizations to urge upon the Government this recognition; and it therefore becomes doubly necessary and obligatory upon us to urge it for them. My observation is that an organization, when sometimes it consists only of a president and secretary, with free access to a printing press, will get recognition from legislative bodies when greater numbers unorganized have scarcely any recognition. I have always noticed that the organized men will seek things that they ought not to seek, and so in that case they must be held in check, and we must look with greater generosity upon the presentation of the equally meritorious claims of those who do not organize to push them upon the Government. We are here to do justice, to do the right thing, whether it is politically the best thing to do or not.

The fundamental thing of importance always to be remembered in a republic anyway is that even with the best effort to aid those who aided the republic, republics are usually ungrateful, and it becomes important to preserve the republic for those who ought to know and remember that fact upon every occasion, and this Republic should always be grateful to those who served it. And I am glad here to urge the passage of the bill reported by the committee, and I shall be glad to support the amendment that will be offered to it by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], mentioned a moment ago. We can not afford to leave out of the pale of benefits any man who has served his country in the past in the wars of the country, nor can we afford to let his widow and children cry for bread. To do otherwise would be to follow an improper policy. It would lead to wrong results in the future. Therefore I urge all to support the amendment and to support the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, so much has been said about the possibility of some person who fought Indians not being included by the provisions of this bill that I am going to make a personal reference.

My father served in the Black Hawk War, was a Texas Ranger, served in the Mexican War, and also served in the Civil War; but I am quite confident that of all the services that he rendered the hardest service was fighting mosquitoes and malaria on the wet, flat plains of Illinois. It ought not to be considered that some man who fought Indians in pioneering in the country is the only man who rendered service and the best service to the country. The men who served in bringing the land under cultivation had equal hardships and greater dangers than the men who fought the Indians; and while I am in favor of this bill, the fact that it may not include every one who at some time fought Indians is nothing against it, because it does not pretend to include the ones who underwent the real hardships in subduing a new and raw country; and they were real hardships, of which we enjoy the benefits, and which, if we could, we would be glad to recompense.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, naturally I am in hearty sympathy with the purposes of this bill, and intend to vote for it, and hope every other Member of the House will do likewise. I, however, recognize that in extending the benefits of the pension laws to the survivors and the widows of the deceased men who engaged in these Indian conflicts, we are in a sense paying tribute and respect to men of a pioneer class; not so much, in my judgment, for the bravery which they displayed and for the hardships which they endured in connection with suppressing Indian uprisings as it is a tribute and a respect to and a recognition of all the deeds they performed as pioneers.

Whenever a civilizing force meets a savage force one or the other has got to give way. When the civilized forces of the world began their march across the North American Continent, they found already existing on this continent organized savagery. Civilized men proceeded to clear the way for civilization and civilization's home, and they did the work well. While we can harrow our minds with awful tales of Indian atrocities, the scalping of innocent women and children, the lying in ambush, the shots in the darkness, and all of the sum total that goes to make up the horrors of Indian warfare, yet we must recognize that when we undertook to wrest the land from the savage, we undertook to endure these very things.

Mr. Chairman, in view of what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has just stated, that this bill does not propose to extend the benefit of the pension laws to all of those who participated in the Indian wars, the natural inference therefrom is that the bill proposes to extend its benefits to those who engaged in the most important of the many Indian uprisings; and so I want to call the attention of the members of the committee having the bill in charge, and also the attention of the Members of the House, to one important omission.

From the time when our Pilgrim forefathers landed at Plymouth Rock, from the time of the establishment of the first colony at Jamestown until the present hour, the greatest Indian uprising, with the most awful extent of mortality resulting therefrom that has ever occurred, took place in 1862–63 on the plains of Minnesota and Dakota. From August 18, 1862, during a period of 30 days, more men fell, more women and children were slaughtered, more lives were lost than had been lost in all the other Indian wars since the history of this Government began. And, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me an omission more than slight when I find that there is no provision in the bill to take care of the hardy sons of the prairie who did not wait for a call for volunteers, who did not wait to be mustered in, who did not wait to be assured that they would be paid by the Government or the State, but who left their farms and their firesides and their homes, and gathered like the Minutemen of '76 and grappled with this most deadly of foes and beat him back to submission. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I propose, when the opportune time comes, to offer an amendment that will give the benefits of the provisions of this act to those who participated in suppressing that greatest of all Indian uprisings, and I sincerely trust the gentlemen in charge of the bill will see fit to admit the propriety of the amendment and will accept it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, may I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It may be of interest to the membership of the House, inasmuch as the subject has been mentioned, to say that the incidents associated with this uprising really give it a peculiar and important character. The great reason that animated the Indians to the attack was, first, some alleged wrongs that they had received, the withholding of annuities, and so on, gave the basis to the movement; but that which spurred them on to the attack immediately was the propaganda carried among them that the North had been licked; that the Government of the United States had gone to pieces; that no longer could they expect to receive from the Government of the United States the payments amounting to more than $3,000,000, which we had obligated ourselves to pay. Emissaries of an enemy of the United States fomented insurrection, so that in one sense the men who assisted in putting down that insurrection were engaged in fighting the general conflict then being waged in the United States, but under the pension laws of the Government, of course, they can not be participants thereunder.

The blow came out of a clear sky, without a moment's warning, without time for preparation to resist it. And when the enemy was first defeated in Minnesota, and subsequently driven across into Dakota, these, the fiercest, the strongest, the bravest, and the mightiest of all the red men that ever peopled America, continued to fight for several years.

Mr. STEENERSON. The Sioux.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The Sioux. When we read of the little uprisings that occurred in the early Colonial days, we think our ancestors had to combat a savage and a terrible foe; but that foe was a mere child compared to the thousands of giants who roamed Nebraska, Dakota, and Minnesota on their ponies, sweeping all before them like a whirlwind. Man for man as a fighting force, the Sioux Indian has never been equaled since the dawn of the first day. It was against this foe that the men for whom I speak hurled themselves, and from them wrested the mastery of the great West. Mr. Chairman, I was born not many miles from the region where this conflict started. Some of my relatives participated in the effort to put down the uprising. They are all dead now; there is no one who would be a participant under the benefits of this act. But there are some left, still living out in the Dakotas and in Minnesota, who participated in putting down the greatest of Indian uprisings and saving the day, and I think they ought to receive the blessings of this act.

Let me cite one illustration. We were all thrilled a few years ago in America because a great Executive of the United States showed his marvelous physical strength by riding 97 miles in 24 hours. My good friends, one man, the son of a farmer, when Fort Ridgely was attacked, slipped through the Indian line, through the cordon of enemies, in a thunderstorm, and in 19 hours rode 173 miles to Fort Snelling, Minn., and gave the alarm. [Applause.] I do not think among all the expert riders of America, among the skilled riders of the arena, there has ever been a man who duplicated that feat. He did not do it on one horse, he had several. It is for this class of men that I speak, and I trust the chairman of the committee having the bill in charge will accept the amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Illinois does not desire to use any more time, we will begin reading the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to see this bill presented at such an early date in the session, because I believe its early passage here will probably mean its passage at the other end of the Capitol. I have no criticism to present of the bill except those I present favoring liberalizing the bill.

There are various organizations that took part in controlling these public enemies at different stages of our national history that I fear are not included in this bill. I trust that here in this committee, before the bill becomes a law, the members of these organizations will be recognized.

There is one feature of the bill which I trust may be changed. It requires a service of at least 90 days before anyone can have the benefits of this act. Yet in the last war, Indian war, which took place in southern Dakota and northern Nebraska, the whole period of the war was less than 90 days. It began some time in November and closed early in January. So that all of them who presented themselves and participated in that war from beginning to end would be excluded under the provisions of this act. The only means of attaching them to the benefits of this act would be to tack on a service in some other Indian war. The wide separation in time of these wars and their locations makes the tacking provision practically useless. I do not think it is fair to use the 90-day period for a number of reasons. The reason given for the 90-day period is that it is the period given in the Civil War pension bill. The 90-day service, I understand, was fixed in the Civil War pension act because there were a great many who served for less than three months toward the close of the war. Further, a great many of those who so entered received liberal bounties from municipalities, States, and the General Government. I think the shorter a war can be made the more humane it is, and there should not before the war, during the war, or after the war be any public act that would be an encouragement or tend to encourage the extension or the lengthening of the war.

More than that, this is less liberal than the pension act to the soldiers of the Civil War. The maximum pension is only $20 as compared with $30 to the soldier of the Civil War. It seems to me that it would be proper to adopt an amendment making it 30 days instead of 90.

In my own State, in the last Indian war a company from my own home belonging to a regiment of Nebraska, joined with the Army of the United States to put down what we call the Sioux rebellion. There was in that company from my own district two notable characters. Gen. Colby, who was a soldier in the Civil War and rose to the rank of general in the Spanish-American War, was a colonel in the Sioux War. Gen. Culver, who was a lieutenant in the Civil War, a colonel in the Spanish War, and an officer in this war. I know that the young men who went out from my home and cooperated with the regulars were effective in quelling that disturbance. The mere fact that the Indians were not able to hold out 90 days was no discredit but rather a credit to the boys who were endangering their lives at the front.

I think that the terms of the bill should be made liberal because these men did not go out and fight men of their own standard of civilization. They went out to fight men of inferior civilization, who knew not chivalry and had no instincts of humanity.

In the Revolutionary War, the War of 1812, and the Civil War our soldiers went up against as brave men as they were, and whether they were victors in the conflict or whether they were defeated they knew that after the battle was over there was an asylum and a hospital. They knew they were to meet men with common instincts of humanity with their own.

These men who went to defend the homes of the West, were men who went out, not perhaps to defend the Government, because the Government was not in danger, but they did go out to defend their neighbors' homes and to defend those that were defenseless. Because it was a war against American homes and not a war against the Government. It was in effect more a war against women and children than it was against the fighting men of the Nation. So when we come to remember those who did service in behalf of our people, we ought to be liberal in including those who are entitled to consideration from the Government.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be read for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions, limitations, and benefits of an act entitled "An act granting pensions to survivors of the Indian wars of 1832 to 1842, inclusive, known as the Black Hawk War, Creek War, Cherokee disturbances, and the Seminole War," approved July 27, 1892, as amended on February 19, 1913, be, and the same are hereby, extended from the date of the passage of this act to the surviving officers and enlisted men, including militia and volunteers of the military service of the United States, who have reached the age of 62 years and who served for 90 days in the campaign in southern Oregon and Idaho and northern parts of California and Nevada from 1865 to 1868, inclusive; the campaign against the Cheyennes, Arapahoes, Kiowas, and Comanches in Kansas, Colorado, and Indian Territory from 1867 to 1869, inclusive; the Modoc War of 1872 and 1873; the campaign against the Apaches of Arizona in 1873; the campaign against the Kiowas, Comanches, and Cheyennes in Kansas, Colorado, Texas, Indian Territory, and New Mexico in 1874 and 1875; the campaign against the Northern Cheyennes and Sioux in 1876 and 1877; the Nez Perce War of 1877; the Bannock War of 1878; the campaign against the Northern Cheyennes in 1878 and 1879; the campaign against the Ute Indians in Colorado and Utah from September, 1879, to November, 1880, inclusive; the campaign against the Apache Indians in Arizona in 1885 and 1886; and the campaign against the Sioux Indians in South Dakota from November, 1890, to January, 1891, inclusive; and also to include the surviving widows of said officers and enlisted men who shall have married said survivor prior to the passage of this act: Provided, That such widows have not remarried: Provided further, That where there is no record of enlistment or muster into the service of the United States in any of the wars mentioned in this act, the record of pay by the United States shall be accepted as full and satisfactory proof of such enlistment and service: And provided further, That all contracts heretofore made between the beneficiaries under this act and pension attorneys and claim agents are hereby declared null and void.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 9, after the word "men," insert the words "who shall have married said survivor prior to the passage of this act: Provided,"

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which is taken from the bill offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 2, after the word "act," insert the following:
"To the surviving officers and enlisted men of the Texas volunteers who served in defense of the frontier of that State against Mexican marauders and Indian depredations from January 1, 1859, to January 1, 1861, inclusive, and from the year 1866 to the year 1876, inclusive, and"

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment merely includes the Texas Rangers and it will be observed that we except a period between 1861 and 1866, because that was during the Civil War period and some of those Rangers were fighting as a part of the Confederate forces. Although they were not used against the northern troops, they were fighting Indians, but enlisted primarily as Confederate troops. Therefore it would not be proper to include them here. That period is eliminated from the amendment. It provides for those who served prior to the Civil War and after the Civil War. Later on, of course, if this amendment should be adopted, another will be offered authorizing the acceptance of the records of enlistments at Austin, Tex. This amendment includes the very men who held back certain savage tribes, among them those who were later held as prisoners of war for more than 40 years, the Apaches, including also the Comanches, the Arapahoes, and affiliated bands. The Government of the United States undertook at a later date to stand responsible for those Indians and thereby relieved the depredations from Texas and the Five Civilized Tribes and Arkansas and New Mexico. In all fairness, this amendment ought to be adopted because the records are clear and it can be ascertained whether they really enlisted and served. Some of these men served as high as five and six years, and have never been beneficiaries under any pension legislation. I trust the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have personal knowledge of the fact that what the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] says is true. A very limited number of the survivors of those Indian wars will benefit by this legislation. I doubt if in the whole State of Texas there could possibly be found 100 of them, although that is a guess. I do know personally a number of old men, very old men, who did valiant and valuable service in protecting the frontier against marauding Indians, some of whom came in from Mexico, some of whom came in from the northern part of the country—and by that I mean from that part of the country to the north of that section of Texas in which they were operating.

Mr. SHERWOOD. What is the number of those Texas Rangers?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I was just saying that I doubt if 100 of them survive now.

Mr. SLOAN. What sort of an organization did they have?

Mr. SLAYDEN. It was a State organization. The records are in the capitol at Austin.

Mr. SLOAN. Under what designation would they come now—Texas Rangers?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Texas Rangers is not an official term.

Mr. SLOAN. What would be the official designation?

Mr. SLAYDEN. In some instances the State called for volunteers and a company would be organized of 15 or 20 or 30 men, sometimes rangers and others. They were known as the company of Capt. Thom, Capt. Tobin, and so on.

Mr. SLOAN. It would have some official designation.

Mr. SLAYDEN. They were put into service by the State authorities and usually organized as companies.

Mr. LOBECK. It would be in the adjutant general's report.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes. It is in the records of the State of Texas.

Mr. SUMNERS. Is it not a fact that these men would now have a pensionable status if the State of Texas had been compensated for the service they rendered? Is it not true that the loss of the muster roll, subsequently found, would have given them such a status had it been brought to light at the time the appropriation was made?

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman is correct about that. Part of the records of the State of Texas were scattered and some lost by the fire in the State capitol; but some were found subsequent to legislation here which provided for the pension of those people who were in organizations whose services had been recognized as for the United States and for whose services the State of Texas had been compensated for sums of money spent for doing work of that character, properly the duty of the Federal Government.

Some of them have not become beneficiaries of that legislation, although since that time some of these rolls have been found and are now in the archives at the capitol at Austin. I think that if there is to be any recognition of the services at all it is entirely proper that these people should be recognized for their great service, a service of immense value to the State of Texas and the country at large.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that the object of this amendment is to place these Texas Rangers, militiamen, or whatever you call them, upon a pensionable status?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And that is the object of this amendment?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And is it not a further fact that the United States Government in paying the State of Texas or refunding to the State of Texas the amount of money that she spent in paying the salaries due to officers and men, and also furnishing supplies, and so forth, which has been refunded to the State of Texas by the United States Government, is a recognition of the fact that they did this service?

Mr. SLAYDEN. In some instances that is true.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And the only question is where the muster rolls have been lost, as referred to by the two gentlemen from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Does the gentleman from Colorado reserve his point of order or make it?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order. I do not desire to discuss the point of order at any length. The title of the bill is:

To pension the survivors of certain Indian wars from 1865 to January, 1891, inclusive, and for other purposes.

This amendment goes back of 1865 in the Civil War period, and I think the amendment clearly is not germane and is out of order.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, the Chair could not sustain a point of order based upon a date?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order, he will state to the gentleman.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard on the amendment. In common with every other westerner, I would like to see this pension legislation made as liberal as possible. But, Mr. Chairman, the committee and the House will find it necessary to place some limit upon our generosity. Your committee decided to adopt the War Department's definition of an Indian war. Now, you will find the War Department has made a very careful examination of that proposition, and in a communication to the Committee on Pensions it is stated:

The War Department has had occasion at various times to determine, in connection with the question of the wearing of the "service-in-war" chevrons by enlisted men in the Army, what Indian campaigns approaching the magnitude of wars were such as to entitle enlisted men to wear that chevron.

And after an exhaustive investigation the War Department determined there had been 12 campaigns which rose to the dignity of Indian wars, and your Committee on Pensions decided to limit this legislation to those Indian wars and to the men who participated in them. If you adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY], then you should throw open the gates. You should treat every man who served against the Indians on terms of absolute equality. You should lay down the proposition that any man who, between 1865 and 1892, served 30 days or 90 days in an Indian campaign should be entitled to a pension.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. KEATING. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman does not mean to contend seriously that an individual who resisted the effort of Indians to steal his cattle or murder members of his household has been engaged in an Indian war and therefore is entitled to the benefit of pension legislation as much as a man who went forth with his neighbors in an organization recognized by the State——

Mr. MURRAY. And by the Federal Government.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And by the Federal Government, does he?

Mr. KEATING. If I accepted the gentleman's amendment and other amendments which will be suggested, I would be drifting in the direction the gentleman suggests. I will say to the gentleman that I do not believe we should establish any such standard. I believe we should adopt the standard accepted by the War Department.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman stated just now he believed in having pension legislation as liberal as possible. I do not. I believe in having it just; but if you are going to pension people who participated in Indian wars, whose lives were frequently sacrificed, who endured the hardships, some of whom were frequently wounded, whose property was destroyed, why, I think they are entitled to just as much consideration as those who were in a war which may, perhaps, have been a little greater in respect to numbers engaged, but whose hardships were no more than these other men endured or where the risks were any greater.

Mr. KEATING. Where we part company, Mr. Chairman, is when the gentleman undertakes to define what constitutes an Indian war. I accept the definition of the War Department, which has laid down the proposition that between 1865 and 1892 we had 12 Indian wars.

Mr. MURRAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I do.

Mr. MURRAY. Will the gentleman go to Sherman's definition?

Mr. KEATING. Yes; I will accept that.

Mr. MURRAY. Well, it was raised on the border.

Mr. KEATING. I trust, Mr. Chairman, the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state, following what has been said, that if the doctrine of estoppel is to be applied as it is usually in courts, and so forth, that as the United States Government has not only paid or refunded to the State of Texas the amount of money spent on her soldiers in defending the frontier, that would be a governmental or legislative recognition of the fact that they had performed these services, and that would of itself place the soldiers in that class of pensionable status, and that is all we desire to have done here.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. KEATING) there were—ayes 44, noes 31.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I object to the vote, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seven Members are present, a quorum.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, before that is offered let the gentleman from Texas offer an amendment to perfect——

Mr. THOMAS. No; Mr. Chairman, I do not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. My amendment is part of the second section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "inclusive" the following:

"That the provisions of this act shall extend to the officers and men of the organizations of the Kentucky Militia designated as the Middle Green River Battalion, the Green River Battalion, Frankfort Battalion, Paducah Battalion, Sandy Valley Battalion (known as the Capital Guard), the North Cumberland Battalion, Three Forks Battalion, Harlan County Battalion, Halls Gap Battalion, South Cumberland Battalion, First Kentucky State Cavalry, Casey County State Guard, Frankfort Battalion, and Captain Bussey's Bath County Rangers, and all other organizations of Kentucky State Militia who served 90 days or more during the Civil War while said militia organizations were cooperating with the United States Government in said war, or who were disabled by reason of injury received or disease contracted in the line of duty in said service as aforesaid; and the provisions of this act shall be extended to the widows and minor children of said officers and men under 16 years of age, and to dependent parents of such officers and men."

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. KEATING. No.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I will discuss the point of order.

Mr. KEATING. If the gentleman desires, I will reserve it.

Mr. THOMAS. All right. Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment to pension the Kentucky State troops. There were a number of companies of those troops, and they were under the command of Federal officers during the Civil War, and their operations were directed by Federal officers.

Mr. MURRAY. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MURRAY. Did you include Kentucky colonels in your amendment?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir. They are all there.

Mr. MURRAY. Then you have got everybody in Kentucky.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir; it includes the Kentucky colonels. It will not include anybody in Oklahoma, however, as there are no colonels out there. They are all Indian fighters. [Laughter.] Now, these State troops, Mr. Chairman, were under the direct command of Federal officers, as I have stated, and they were under the command of Federal generals of the department which included the State of Kentucky. They were never actually mustered into the service of the United States, but were mustered into the State service under the command, as I have stated, of these Federal officers, and were directed by them. These State troops performed active service all during the Civil War. As most of you gentlemen know who are acquainted with history, Kentucky was right upon the border of the warfare between the North and the South. It was infested by guerrilla bands, and these State troops were used for the purpose of fighting those guerrilla bands, and they performed great and valuable service for the cause of the Union during the Civil War, and many of these State troops were killed and many of them received wounds in battle from which they are still suffering, and many of them contracted disease in the line of duty. And they ought long ago, having performed the same service that was performed in the State of Kentucky by troops which had been mustered into the Federal service, to have been put upon a pensionable footing.

I do not know whether a point of order will lie against this amendment or not; but I want to call the attention of this House to the fact that the State troops of Kentucky served during the Civil War under the command of Federal officers; that they performed valiant service in the cause of the Union; and not one of them has ever yet been able to draw a pension from this Government. And the Invalid Pension Committee, which has this bill in charge, should bring in a bill here, if the point of order lies against this amendment, to pension these men, because they deserve it just as much as any other soldiers who fought to uphold the flag of the Union. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to discuss the point of order for a moment if I can get the attention of my friend from Kentucky. The Chair, a moment ago, held in order an amendment as to certain Texans who were engaged against Indian marauders and Indian depredations. Of course that language did not mean that the soldier had to be engaged, in order to get the benefits of this act, both against Mexican marauders and also Indian depredations, but he had to be engaged either against Mexican marauders or engaged in reference to the Indian depredations. So that under the ruling of the Chair all the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] needs to do in order to make his amendment in order is to add to it "and Indian depredations." It is true that there were no Indian depredations committed there, but that is a question of fact with which the Chair is not interested. It is also true with reference to the Texas amendment that most of the individuals involved in that were not engaged in protecting against Indian depredations at all, but were engaged along the Mexican border, and if we should pay a pension on account of those Texas Rangers engaged on the Mexican border, there would be equal reason for paying a pension to the distinguished various gentlemen from Kentucky who were engaged along the border during the Civil War.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is the gentleman aware that the legal designation of the Texas forces was "to defend the frontier against hostile Indians and Mexican marauders"——

Mr. MANN. My father served in the Texas Rangers. I am aware of the fact.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas (continuing). And the rules all carried that caption?

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman does not pretend that in order to get the benefit of the act a man must both have served against Mexican marauders and against the Indians? Either one was sufficient service. Now, all the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] has to do, I think, is to add "and Indian depredations," because that will bring it under the terms of the bill in reference to Indians. That is the way the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] got his amendment into the bill. It sneaked in under cover, and did not go through the gate.

Mr. MURRAY. The gentleman from Illinois is quibbling, because, evidently——

Mr. MANN. I am not quibbling at all.

Mr. MURRAY. Does the gentleman from Illinois know——

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman has a sensible remark to make, which would be unusual, I will yield to him.

Mr. MURRAY. Is the gentleman from Illinois aware that that is the designated term in Texas for that class of service?

Mr. MANN. Certainly. But the Chair does not pass upon whether it is a designated term in Texas or not.

Mr. MURRAY. The Chair takes judicial cognizance of the law.

Mr. MANN. The Chair takes cognizance of the fact that the term "Indian depredations" is in the amendment, and it is proper in the ruling for the Chair to take into consideration the pension of those engaged in Indian wars.

Mr. MURRAY. The Chair understood that there were no Indian wars in Kentucky when these men were serving.

Mr. MANN. But the Chair does not pass upon facts as to what is effected by the legislation. The Chair passes upon the facts of the proposition presented. The Chair does not verify the facts. As a matter of fact, if the Chair could pass upon the facts, the gentleman has no equity at all in the proposition he has presented in the bill in the endeavor to kill the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] for his suggestion. [Laughter.] I always proceed to act upon all good suggestions. Therefore I offer to modify my amendment by adding, on page 2 of the amendment, line 4, after the word "aforesaid," the words "or in Indian depredations." [Laughter.]

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. KEATING. I object.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. KEATING. I make a point of order against the amendment, Mr. Chairman. I will not worry the Chair with an argument upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that it takes unanimous consent to withdraw an amendment. Is there objection to unanimous consent?

Mr. KEATING. I object to the gentleman withdrawing it.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard, and the point of order is made on the amendment made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS]. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MILLER of Minnesota: Page 2, line 8, after the semicolon, following the word "exclusive," insert the following: "the campaign against the Sioux in Minnesota and the Dakotas in 1862 and 1863."

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely trust that this amendment will be accepted by the committee, and if for no other reason, for the reason that it is entirely comprehended within the principle upon which they drew the bill.

A few moments ago I offered a few remarks relative to the size and magnitude of this insurrection, the number of people engaged, and the number of lives lost. Without repeating what I then said, I will recapitulate by saying again that more lives were lost during this insurrection, according to the authorities on the subject that I have consulted, than have been lost in Indian wars other than this one during the entire history of our Government.

It appears by the statement made by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] that in drafting this bill the committee aimed to comprehend within its terms and provisions all of those Indian wars properly to be called and described as such that occurred subsequent to those mentioned in previous legislation on this subject, and they adopted for that purpose the recommendation of the language used by the War Department.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The definition of an Indian war?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes; the definition of an Indian war. Now, Mr. Chairman, while it is perhaps permissible and indeed commendable to adopt a recommendation of the War Department about a thing military, yet we can not exactly know now what they had definitely and specifically in mind when they adopted that definition. But we know this, if their definition excludes the period that I ask to be included here, it excludes the biggest Indian war that ever occurred in the history of the United States.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will be pleased to.

Mr. TAGGART. The gentleman's amendment does not specify that these men are to be pensionable, whether they were in the service of the United States or not; that is to say, men who served in militia organizations in that war are the ones the gentleman is seeking to make pensionable?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Those are the ones I would include.

Mr. TAGGART. The other part of the bill provides that the claimant must have served at least 90 days in the United States service.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If the gentleman will permit me, I am subjecting the clause I included here to all the limitations and requirements contained elsewhere in the bill.

Mr. TAGGART. Any man that served 90 days in the service of the United States in 1862, whether he served against Indians or not, or wherever he served, I think is now pensionable under the act of May 11, 1912, and so is his widow.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is not quite true. A man regularly enlisted as a soldier who served in the Regular Establishment or Regular Army or in the Volunteers in 1862 or 1863 would not be pensionable by this bill, because they are now pensionable. This does extend the provisions of the act to the citizen-soldiers who were not regularly enrolled in the Volunteer organizations engaged in the War of the Rebellion.

Mr. TAGGART. That is why I speak of the gentleman's amendment. The other part of the bill provides that the claimant must have served at least 90 days in the United States service. Now, the gentleman's amendment says they must have served in the service of the United States.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think not. I simply desire that the provisions of this act shall be extended to the class of people who helped to put down the Indian insurrection in 1862 and 1863.

Mr. TAGGART. Regardless of whether they were in the United States service or not?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is true.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Were these people organized into companies, battalions, or anything of that kind, to go to the seat of war? Were there muster rolls, and was there a history of each organization kept intact?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes. They are in the State archives at St. Paul.

Mr. SLAYDEN. They were mustered into the service of the State of Minnesota?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. They were subsequently.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Were they at the outset?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. By that I mean during a part of their service. Of course, when they first offered their services they went in with a rush.

Mr. SLAYDEN. As individuals?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes, as individuals; and they were immediately organized into companies, some called "Rangers," and some called by other names.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And all taken into the service?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is the case with the Texas troops.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I had not completed what I desired to say in reference to the service of these men. This Indian insurrection of 1862 and 1863 to which I have called attention was the greatest Indian war in our entire history. There were more Indians engaged, there were more whites engaged before it was over than in any other Indian war, with the possible exception, if you call it an exception, when Gen. Anthony Wayne went into Ohio. There were by far more people killed in the insurrection of 1862, as I have said, than in the Ohio campaign or in any other Indian war in our history. Now, it seems to me that the military department of our Government must have had some quibbling reason, or some reason that is not disclosed, why they did not include this war among the Indian wars of our country. It was the greatest of them all, of the gravest proportions, and there was the greatest loss of life. There was the greatest hardship, the greatest suffering, the greatest privation on the part of the people. Why, there must be men in this House now who almost shudder as they recall what they read in the papers back in 1862–63 of those Indian atrocities; and the citizen soldiery of western Minnesota, hardy pioneers as they were, drawing their blood from the most vigorous and powerful stock that ever peopled this continent, certainly ought not to be neglected in an act of this kind, and certainly ought to receive from the Government of the United States an approval of their heroic deeds. And while I am in favor of extending the benefits of this pension law to the people whom the bill contemplates and comprehends, I ask with all the earnestness I possess that you include within its provisions the best of them all, the men whose deeds stand forth as the greatest of them all, in order that the bill may be just in its terms and fair in its treatment to the hardy pioneers and citizen soldiers who made it possible for civilization to dwell on the western plains of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KEATING) there were—ayes 40, noes 35.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "inclusive," in line 8, page 2, insert: "The campaign against the Sioux in Wyoming in 1865 to 1868."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am very anxious to have this bill become a law, and I would not offer any amendment that would be likely to burden it improperly, or an amendment that did not bring within the purview of the bill men who were clearly entitled to be included within its provisions and benefits.

For some reason, which I am unable to understand, the campaign against the Sioux in Wyoming from 1865 to 1868, following the so-called peace treaty at Fort Laramie, referred to at length in the résumé of the War Department as the beginning of the Indian wars which followed and continued for 15 years or more, is not referred to in the bill. There is no provision in the bill embracing those who served in that hard and trying campaign, lasting nearly three years. I think it is possible that the omission of this important Indian campaign in the list sent up by the War Department is due to the fact that there were comparatively few local or irregular troops engaged. The troops engaged were, in the main, Regulars, but the campaigns were among the bloodiest of all the campaigns on the frontier. Then occurred the Battle of Massacre Hill, in which there were no survivors. There also occurred the famous wagon-box fight, one of the most thrilling in all the history of border warfare, and also the fight further north in the vicinity of Fort Reno. I am certain that those who drafted the bill intended to include those who participated in that very important campaign; but I am certain, after reading the bill carefully, that without an amendment such as this the participants in that very important campaign, lasting nearly three years, would not be brought within and given the benefits of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MONDELL) there were—ayes 41, noes 30.

Mr. KEATING. I call for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. KEATING and Mr. MONDELL.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 44, noes 39.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after the word "inclusive," in line 8, page 3, the following: "That the provisions of this act shall extend to the officers and men of the organizations of the Kentucky Militia designated as the Middle Green River Battalion, the Green River Battalion, Frankfort Battalion, Paducah Battalion, Sandy Valley Battalion (known as the Capital Guard), the North Cumberland Battalion, Three Forks Battalion, Harlan County Battalion, Halls Gap Battalion, South Cumberland Battalion, First Kentucky State Cavalry, Casey County State Guard, Frankfort Battalion, and Capt. Bussey's Bath County Rangers, and all other organizations of Kentucky State Militia who served 90 days or more during the Civil War while said militia organizations were cooperating with the United States Government in said war, or who were disabled by reason of injury received or disease contracted in the line of duty in said service as aforesaid, or in Indian depredations, and the provisions of this act shall be extended to the widows and minor children of said officers and men under 16 years of age, and to dependent parents of such officers and men."

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Kentucky yield for a question?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. OGLESBY. Is not the gentleman willing to include the Ku-Klux in this amendment?

Mr. THOMAS. Have you got any Ku-Klux in your country?

Mr. OGLESBY. I understand that there are a great many Ku-Klux still living in the gentleman's country.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, the gentleman is 40 years behind the times.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado will state his point of order.

Mr. KEATING. My point of order is that the amendment is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, Mr. Chairman. I have got these Kentucky State troops, who performed valiant service in the cause of the Union in the Civil War, coupled up with the Indian fighters, as suggested, and according to the former ruling of the Chair on another amendment, I think the point of order will not lie. That is all I have to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman and to the committee that at the time of that ruling his attention was not called to the fact that the amendment carried with it a provision concerning Mexican marauders, but was under the impression it applied only to Indian depredations. The Chair is therefore now of the opinion that his ruling at that time, so far as Mexican marauders was concerned, was a wrong ruling, but a wrong ruling in that instance would not now justify or cause the Chair to make a similar ruling. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. THOMAS. As I understand it, the Chair has made an honest confession. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HAWLEY: Page 2, line 5, strike out the word "ninety" and insert the word "thirty."

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to reduce the term of service required from 90 days to 30 days. The term of service required for a veteran of the Civil War is 90 days, for a veteran in the Mexican War 60 days. Why the term of service under the conditions under which these wars were fought should be as long as that of the Civil War I do not understand. I want to plead with the committee for a 30-day limit, which is the term of service required for Indian-war veterans in previous acts.

The conditions, as everyone in the West knows, under which these wars were fought were most unusual. People had gone a great distance from civilized communities; the Great Plains intervened between them and civilization; the Indians were numerous, and the Government of the United States provided practically no protection for them. There were forts scattered here and there, but the soldiers were few and the territory vast.

Moreover, it occurred a great many times that the Government's property would have been destroyed had it not been for these volunteers. I have an instance in mind where Indians had attacked a body of Government troops, small in number, and would have exterminated them and destroyed the property belonging to the Government if some settlers had not shouldered their muzzle-loading guns and gone to the rescue of the soldiers.

I think that 30 days is too high a limit, but probably the committee would not consider anything less than that. These people, many of them who might be included in a pension bill if the limit was placed at 30 days, rendered other services against the Indian marauders of which they can produce no evidence of a record character. In the Modoc War, which was divided into two parts by a peace proposal, many volunteers were told after the first fighting that they might return home. Then the massacre occurred, and while some came back some did not get word to come back until too late. A great many soldiers would be benefited if it was a 30-day limit who, in addition to a record service, rendered service for which they can now furnish no record evidence, and therefore could not claim a pension for this. Thirty days was a long service under these conditions.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not a fact that in the war the gentleman refers to some of the most effective service was that rendered by those who were only fighting 30 or 40 days?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; and, without doubt, if it had not been for them the Government troops would have been wiped out before reenforcements arrived.

Mr. McCRACKEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. I will.

Mr. McCRACKEN. Is there any way of proving the service of these men who did that fighting?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; their services would be a matter of record in the Government departments, either in the War Department or the Treasury Department.

Mr. McCRACKEN. What I want to know is, is it possible to show the services of every man engaged in Indian fighting? As I understand, there are a great many who enlisted on the moment—in fact, did not enter into the service, but their services were at the command of the people who were in danger. How are you going to prove the services of those men?

Mr. HAWLEY. There are two other classes not included in this bill. One class is that of men enlisted in some State organization of which a record will be found in the adjutant general's office of the State or Territory. The other are those who volunteered and who served without entering into any formal service. There is no record of their services.

Mr. McCRACKEN. I have in mind a man who was traveling through the country and he saw that the Indians were committing depredations. He gave his services and served perhaps for 30 days. The man was not enlisted for service, but he actually rendered a service. I can not understand how this bill provides a pension for that man.

Mr. HAWLEY. It does not.

Mr. McCRACKEN. Does not the gentleman think it should?

Mr. HAWLEY. I think the bill should have a broader scope than it has. It should be drawn on more generous principles. As I was saying a moment ago, the people who went into these wars furnished their own horses, ammunition, clothing, provided their own food, and went to relieve the Government of the United States, which was in distress, as well as all others menaced by Indians, concerning which I have heard many thrilling accounts around the family fireside in my boyhood. A cry would come in the night that there was an attack on some farm or some locality, perhaps many miles away. Immediately every man who could find a horse and a gun would go to that place and render courageous service. Hundreds and thousands of these will never be benefited by this bill, as the gentleman from Idaho, who just questioned me, indicated. But wherever a record is shown of the service rendered they may get the benefit.

It was a dangerous service, one that not only involved death but it might involve torture at the stake if captured. In the great West many were burned at the stake, many were stretched out on the prairie with arms and legs extended, pinned down, and a fire built over the middle of their bodies. It was a desperate service, and I appeal to-day to all Members that where men take these chances and render that kind of service when their own settlement or that of others were in danger, where they can furnish proof of 30 days' service, it is worthy of recognition by this Government as a service for which men should be remembered. [Applause.]

I had the fortune of being born in the West. My mother went across the plains in 1847 and my father in 1848, and I was born in 1864. I knew and know intimately a number of the men who served in the Indian wars in the Northwest. At that early period we were isolated from the rest of the world. There were two ranges of mountains to cross and two great deserts to go through in order to reach the Pacific coast—the Rockies and the Cascades, and what used to be called the Great American Desert, and the plains lying between the Rockies and the Cascades. The people out there were compelled to serve themselves. They could not apply to the Government for aid, because by the time the Government could have received word of their distress they would have either been destroyed or saved by their own endeavor. Men not only protected their own families but their services were at the disposal of any people who were threatened with Indian hostilities. For instance, wagon trains coming across the plains would find themselves hemmed in by Indians; their ammunition would be running low. They would dispatch, on the best horses they had, their younger, lighter, best riders in several directions toward known settlements. Some of them would be killed in trying to make their escape through the Indian lines. Some would reach a settlement. Immediately those settlers would take their guns, their horses, their feed, their blankets, gather together a little body, and then gradually assemble in a larger body, and go to the help of that wagon train or to the help of the United States mails. The records of the War Department will show that in the period of the Civil War and afterwards, the Department of War and President Lincoln and the succeeding President asked the people of Oregon—for at that time Oregon and Washington were the old Oregon Territory—to aid the Government in the protection of settlers and wagon trains and the United States mails.

These men were not able at all times to be enlisted in the service of the United States. They would travel many days, suffer many hardships, run the risks that were incident to Indian warfare, do the work of dispersing the Indians, and bring the trains in safely. Those who have never lived in an Indian country do not know the terror of the Indian warfare; not that the men were afraid to fight the Indians, although torture was probably the inevitable result of capture; but the things they dreaded most and that struck a cold chill into their hearts were the things that would happen to the women and children, for it was rather a point of honor or dishonor among many of the Indians in that section—not all of them, however—that if a settlement or wagon train or in any body of people who were captured the women and girls should always be abused, and many of them would die under that defilement. For that reason men, as all these western men were, loyal to womanhood, would render what service they could.

The record of enlistment in the service of or pay by the United States would be adequate proof, but in many instances these men were called out by the States, sometimes at the request of the National Government, to take care of their people, especially in the period immediately after the Civil War, in that far western country, where we could not get into touch with the Government readily—that in the event there is no record of muster in or pay from the United States Government the records of the States or Territories found in the adjutant generals' offices, showing service and pay, should be adequate.

But even that will not include all the deserving men, and I think that the Secretary of the Interior should be authorized, by proper regulation, to determine what shall be necessary proof on the part of those who volunteered for service, who did good service, who can prove that service in a satisfactory way, and that they, too, should be placed on the rolls.

I know some of these men who served in the war; for instance, in the Modoc War, Capt. Applegate, a brave and capable soldier, who commanded the troops. The situation in that war may be interesting. These Modocs were a very warlike tribe, as many of the western Indians were. They lived in the country where by warfare with each other they had learned the arts of their primitive warfare very effectively. They were shrewd, they were cautious, they struck suddenly, and went quickly away. Following them was dangerous, because they laid ambuscades, and, as I said before, torture was inflicted on captured prisoners. These Indians in the Modoc War went into the lava beds. These lava beds are great masses of rock, irregular in character, having hidden and secret trails and caverns connecting one place with another, and large bodies of Indians could be secreted absolutely out of sight, and the troops, trying to approach them, would approach apparently an open space, and when they appeared upon the horizon the Indians, from these caverns or potholes in the rocks or blowholes in the lava, could fire at them with perfect safety, and many lost their lives in this way.

In southern Oregon, for instance, on the Rogue River and on the Umpqua River, through which wagon trains came over the old Oregon-California trail, running along the boundary between Oregon and California, the Indians would watch until the wagon trains were on the river and were ferrying their stock and wagons across. The plan was usually to take the stock and women over first. The men stayed back to guard those who were on the side from which they were departing, some few having gone on ahead. The Indians would suddenly strike at the women and children, swooping down, seizing what they could, and carrying them away. If the men were watchful, they might check them. Then the wagon train would be divided and under the fire of the Indians. They would apply to the settlers, sending out couriers for aid, and for many miles around these men volunteered, furnished their own equipment, and came there to either succeed or die in the relief of those people.

In addition to the arguments that have been made in behalf of those who were regularly enlisted in the United States service and for those who were regularly enlisted in the State service, I want to make a plea for those who rendered volunteer service, who can prove their services, that they, too, are worthy of recognition. It was not a regular warfare; it was an irregular warfare. When you depart from a regular warfare, and especially in a far-distant portion of the domain where men rendered not only service to themselves—for they simply protected themselves, and that is what they were expected to do when they went there—and they protected not only wagon trains at the request of the Government, but the United States mails and property, and sometimes, as in the wars in eastern Oregon, they went to the relief of the Government soldiers and equipment. [Applause.]

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, speaking on the amendment that the gentleman from Oregon has offered, I am heartily in favor of it. Capt. Applegate, who served in the Modoc Indian War, has corresponded with me, as I am sure he has with the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY]. He gave valiant service with his brother and relatives, and they served in the neighborhood of 35 days. That volunteer organization came to the relief of the Government at that time and made it possible to exterminate these Indians and obtain relief. I imagine that of the men in that service possibly not over 15 are left. The same may be said of those who served in southern Oregon, northeastern California, and northwestern Nevada when the roving bands of Indians came from Idaho, northern Oregon, and those in northern California and in Nevada. They would steal from practically every settler in the Warner Valley country, and in the Surprise Valley country, and in the eastern Oregon part, and came on down to what is known as Honey Lake Valley, in California; and I have heard old pioneers tell many times of how there, upon the edge of the settlement, they killed off a whole family, consisting of Mr. Pearson, his wife, and two daughters. They came in the night and killed the father and mother and two daughters. A volunteer corps was organized at once and they went after these Indians and met with success. They were out only in the neighborhood of 40 days. The oldest settler in that community, Peter Lassen, was one of the early pioneers. He came across the continent in 1849, and Lassen County is named after him. He was one of the Indian hunters, and while out on one of these expeditions was shot by the Indians. Many of those people lost their lives.

The entire community gave their time and service and horses and everything they had to protect the settlement in those places, and they gave it in a time that did not reach 90 days. They were on the alert practically all of the time. They were watching the frontier. They were protecting their homes and their neighbors' homes, and they were in small bands and organizations. When the time finally came they organized and did the work that made it possible to assist and save the soldiery at Fort Crook and later at Fort Bidwell in northern California. It has been recognized that their service was of the very best. I was acquainted with 50 or 60 of those in northeastern California who participated in the last and most effective battle, and my recollection is that not over five or six of those men are living. Mr. Jacobs, one of the men who participated during that campaign, writes me that none of these men would obtain a pension if we make it 90 days, but that the few remaining would if we made it 30 days.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. Is it not a fact that a great many of the men who served the colors during the Civil War for more than 30 days, or between 30 and 90 days, less than 90 days, although they may have been under fire, are denied pensions, and does the gentleman propose to treat these veterans of the Indian wars more generously than the men who saved the Union?

Mr. RAKER. Not more generously, but here is the position: They are in an entirely different shape. A man enlists and he is in for more than 90 days whether in actual service or not, and if so he gets his pension, but here you must not be in actual service, because there was no time from the time these organizations went out when they were not in active service until they returned or until they completed their work. They might for months have been guarding their homes, six months or longer, and because they did not actually enter the organization before that time, when it was necessary for them to go out and take their lives in their hands and enter into an active campaign, not merely being on the marching line, but it depending upon who was the best shot, they are now to be denied pensions. By virtue of their heroism and of their marksmanship and their courage they were able to end most of these wars in from 30 to 45 days. I am for granting these valiant pioneers recognition, and while it is late coming I am nevertheless in favor of granting them and their widows a pension.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Chairman, before the vote is taken, I ask unanimous consent of the committee to ask the chairman of the committee a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to ask the chairman of the committee a question. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OGLESBY. Does the bill require that the 90 days' service should be continuous?

Mr. KEATING. It does not.

Mr. OGLESBY. I understand there are some 12 of these wars and if a man served 30 days in each of three of them he would come under the provision of the bill?

Mr. KEATING. There is no question about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HAWLEY) there were—ayes 42, noes 42.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers (Mr. HAWLEY and Mr. KEATING) reported that there were—ayes 38, noes 43.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 23, after the word "seventy-nine," insert "the Black Hawk Indian War in Utah from 1865 to 1867, inclusive."

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I have offered is intended to include in the provisions of this bill the survivors of the Indian war in Utah from 1865 to 1867, inclusive. During that period hostile Indians, under the leadership of a chief known as Black Hawk, waged one of the most destructive and vexatious wars that ever occurred in the West. His forces at first were not large, but by the success of his early raids and the quantity of plunder of which he despoiled the settlers he rapidly gained accessions to his ranks, until he spread devastation and terror throughout the southern counties, which constituted the theater of his hostilities. Six extensive and flourishing settlements in Sevier and Piute Counties, three in San Pete, and a number of other settlements in Washington, Kane, and Iron Counties were abandoned, it being found impracticable to extend the necessary protection over such an extensive frontier.

Immediately upon the outbreak of hostilities in 1865 Col.-O. H. Irish, Superintendent of Indian Affairs, understanding the temper of the Indians and the extent of the danger, appealed to the Federal authorities for an adequate military force to protect the people and bring the Indians into submission, but he was informed that the troops of the Regular Army were all required to guard the mails and the settlements along the overland mail route, and that the Territorial militia must be relied upon to suppress the Indian hostilities in Utah.

At the approach of winter, the Indians retreated through the mountain passes known to them to a remote section near the junction of the Green and Grand Rivers. Early in 1866 Black Hawk, having largely reinforced his hostile band, went on the warpath again.

Col. F. H. Head, Superintendent of Indian Affairs, fearing a general Indian uprising as a result of Black Hawk's growing influence, again applied to Gen. Dodge at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., then commander of the military district embracing Utah, for an adequate military force to defend the people and to force the Indians to become peaceful.

Gen. Dodge replied that there were no troops available for Indian service in remote sections, and that the Territorial militia would have to be called into action to meet the emergency. Accordingly, Gov. Charles Durkee called out all the militia nearest to the place of hostility; but it was found necessary to augment this force by dispatching a large force from the more populous sections in the northern part of the Territory.

I have briefly outlined some of the more prominent incidents of this devastating war, and in support of what I have related I shall read from official sources extracts from the reports of the Superintendent of Indian Affairs made to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs covering these years and treating of these conditions.

They are as follows:

[From the annual report of the Superintendent of Indian Affairs of the Utah superintendency, O. H. Irish, dated at Salt Lake City, Utah, Sept. 9, 1865 (Report of the Secretary of Interior, 1865–66, p. 314).]

THE PAHUTES.

During the past year the Indians have been peaceful, with the exception of the difficulties with a band of outlaws in San Pete Valley, mentioned in my letter of the 28th of April last. At that time I requested the military authorities to send a sufficient force to protect the settlers and to arrest the offending Indians. This was refused, and the settlers were left to take care of themselves; they organized a force of about 80 men and drove the Indians back to Grand River, killing about one-third of the number of those who were engaged in committing the depredations.

Notwithstanding the Indians of this superintendency are peaceful now, in view of the fact that Indian wars are raging on our immediate boundaries in Nevada, Idaho, Colorado, and Arizona, how long they will remain so it is impossible to tell, unless those Indians who are in arms against the Government are speedily and thoroughly subdued.

[Letter of F. H. Head, superintendent, to Hon. D. N. Cooley, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Washington, D. C., dated at Great Salt Lake City, Apr. 30, 1866 (Report of Secretary of Interior, 1866–67, p. 128).]

SIR: Black Hawk, a somewhat prominent chief of the Utah Indians, has been engaged for more than a year past in active hostilities against the settlements in the southern portion of this territory. His band consisted at first of but 44 men, who were mostly outlaws and desperate characters from his own and other tribes. During the summer and autumn of 1865 he made several successful forays upon the weak and unprotected settlements in Sanpete and Sevier Counties, killed, in all, 32 whites, and drove away to the mountains upward of 2,000 cattle and horses.

Forty of his warriors were killed by the settlers in repelling his different attacks. His success in stealing, however, enabled him to feed abundantly and mount all Indians who joined him, and the prestige acquired by his raids was such that his numbers were constantly on the increase, despite his occasional losses of men. He spent the winter where the Grand and Green Rivers unite to form the Colorado. On the 20th instant he again commenced his depredations by making an attack upon Salina, a small settlement in Sevier County. He succeeded in driving to the mountains about 200 cattle, killing two men who were guarding them, and compelling the abandonment of the settlement.

His band, from what I consider entirely reliable information, now numbers 100 warriors, one-half of whom are Navajos from New Mexico. I am very apprehensive that unless Black Hawk is severely chastised an Indian war of considerable magnitude may be inaugurated. He has never yet met with a serious reverse, having always attacked small settlements or unprotected families. He has thus acquired a considerable reputation among the various Indian tribes, and I fear many of the more adventurous will join him from the bands now friendly. The ill feeling engendered by the death of San Pitch and by the nearly starving condition of the Indians on the Uintah Reservation, concerning which I had the honor to address you on the 23d instant, will tend to promote the result.

In view of the circumstance and for the purpose of preventing accessions to the ranks of the hostile Indians, I have, after consultation with Gov. Durkee, desired Col. Potter, commanding the United States troops in this district, to send two or three companies of soldiers to that portion of the Territory to protect the settlements and repel further attacks. I have also sent Indian runners to have an interview with Black Hawk and to urge him to meet me for the purpose of establishing a permanent peace. I have little hope, however, that he will do this, at least before he is defeated, with the loss of some portion of his warriors, as he has heretofore been boldly defiant, rejecting with scorn all overtures for peace. Col. Potter has telegraphed to Gen. Dodge for instructions in reference to my application. I should be much pleased to have an expression of your views as to the policy to be further pursued in this matter.

Yours, etc., ——— ———.

[From the annual report of Supt. F. H. Head, of the Utah superintendency, dated Salt Lake City, Utah, Sept. 20, 1866 (Report of the Secretary of the Interior, pp. 122–126).]

INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

A small band of outlaws, under the command of a chief named Black Hawk, have been engaged in hostilities for nearly two years. Their number did not at first exceed 50 men, and in the various skirmishes which have taken place nearly that number have been killed, but accessions have been continually had from among the more reckless Indians of the different bands, so that their number has increased to about 60 men. They have made raids upon several of the small and defenseless settlements in the southern portion of the Territory for the purpose of stealing cattle and horses, fighting when pursued by the settlers who sought to recover their stock. During the present year they have made two such raids upon the settlements of Salina and Round Valley, stealing in each instance nearly 200 cattle and horses. I applied in April last to the officer in command of the United States forces at Camp Douglas, in this Territory, asking him to station one or two companies of soldiers in the southeastern portion of the Territory to protect the settlers. He was not able to do so, however, as he was expecting that all his command, being volunteers, would shortly be mustered out of service. The settlers raised some 200 men from various parts of the Territory, who were stationed at the more exposed points, since which time no further depredations have been committed. * * *

The Uintahs were previously somewhat ill disposed from the nonreception of their presents and from the fact that almost no provision had been furnished them during the winter. The winter was one of unusual severity, and they had nearly perished of starvation. Agent L. B. Kinney, in charge at the Uintah Agency, was guilty of gross neglect of duty, and had expended the liberal appropriation made by the Government in such manner as to be of no benefit to the Indians. The Indians were greatly exasperated against him for having made countless promises to them which were not fulfilled.

The causes above named united in producing much ill feeling among the Indians (San Piches), who prepared for general war. Large numbers were assembled in Uintah Valley. The laborers at the Indian farm were much alarmed and left the reservation. In May I started accordingly with four wagons loaded with goods and flour. Ex-Gov. Brigham Young sent out at the same time some 70 beef cattle as a present to the Indians. * * * After remaining nearly two weeks, holding numerous councils with the Indians, everything was arranged on a basis mutually satisfactory.

I should be doing injustice to my own feelings did I fail to mention in this report the cordial cooperation I have at all times experienced from all the principal Mormons throughout the Territory. In the execution of my official duties I have been obliged often to ask their assistance and cooperation, and in no instance have I failed to receive the most cheerful and hearty aid.

[From a letter by F. H. Head, superintendent, to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated June 21, 1866 (Secretary of the Interior's Report, 1866–67, p. 129).]

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 30th of May approving my course thus far relative to the acts of the hostile Utah chief, Black Hawk. Immediately subsequent to my communication of April 30 I started for Corn Creek, which is one of the nearest settlements to the scenes of Black Hawk's most recent depredations. * * * Black Hawk, instead of being 50 miles distant, as I had been advised, was over 400 miles away in a southeast direction, having gone to endeavor to procure recruits from among the Elk Mountain Utes, the most powerful tribe in the Territory, who can bring into the field upward of 4,000 warriors. * * *

While at Corn Creek I learned that the Uinta Indians had at length commenced hostilities by a raid from Uinta Valley upon Springfield, carrying away some 150 horses and mules, and also, two or three days later, by a similar raid upon Heber City, from which settlement they took nearly 100 cattle and horses. * * *

The morning of my departure (from Heber City) I was informed by Tabby, the head chief, that when he received notice of my arrival in the valley himself and all his warriors were on their way to join the hostile Indians in the southern part of the Territory in their war upon the settlements. He also informed me that Black Hawk, having secured a sufficient number of recruits among the Elk Mountain Utes to swell his force to 300 warriors, was then setting out from the Elk Mountain country to attack the weaker settlements in San Pete County.

I advised you in my communication of the 30th of April that I had applied to the military authorities to send two or three companies of troops to protect the settlers in those portions of the Territory most exposed to Indian raids, and that Col. Potter, commanding at this point, had telegraphed for instructions. A copy of the response to such communication is herewith inclosed.

On reaching this city on my return from Uinta, I communicated the facts in my possession relative to Black Hawk to Gov. Durkee. Gen. Wells, one of the principal militia officers, after consulting with the governor, has raised two or three companies of militia and proceeded to the threatened locality to protect the settlers from the expected attack. * * *

The telegram referred to is as follows:

"FORT LEAVENWORTH, KANS., May 2, 1866.

"Gen. Pope telegraphs that the Superintendent of Indian Affairs will have to depend for the present on the militia to compel the Indians to behave at Selina.

"By command of Maj. Gen. Dodge.

"SAMUEL E. MACKEY,
"Acting Assistant Adjutant General.

"Col. CARROLL H. POTTER,
"Commanding District of Utah."

[From the annual report of the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, F. H. Head, dated Salt Lake City, Utah, Aug. 22, 1867. (Report of Secretary of Interior, 1867–68, p. 173 et seq.)]

INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

In my last annual report mention was made of a series of depredations by Black Hawk, a hostile Utah chief, who, with a small band of outlaws from the different tribes of Utah Indians, was engaged in active hostilities. (He has never had above 100 men; but, by watching opportunities to steal cattle from the weaker settlements, has accomplished much mischief.) During the past year his depredations have been continued, but with much less success and frequency than before. * * *

His depredations since my last report have been inconsiderable, being confined to petty stealing raids. Several times, however, when cattle have been stolen from the settlers, they have pursued him, and conflicts have occurred in which, in all, 10 or 12 whites and probably an equal number of Indians have been killed. * * *

While it is true that these wars are not of record in the War Department, these official reports in the Indian Bureau fully set forth the sanguinary and destructive and devastating strife that occurred.

No fair-minded man who has read the résumé of the wars described and which are included in this bill will contend for a moment but that these Utah Indian wars are of far greater magnitude and dignity than many of the engagements covered by the bill, and if Regular troops had been available and had engaged in these campaigns, unquestionably their services would have been recognized and would have been included in this bill.

The very first paragraph in the résumé of Indian wars included in the report accompanying this bill clearly explains that in 1865 and 1866 there was a serious deficiency in the Regular Army to meet the demand for protection on the western frontier, and reads as follows:

HISTORICAL RÉSUMÉ OF CERTAIN INDIAN CAMPAIGNS.

[By S. J. Bayard Schindel, captain, General Staff.]

Pursuant to verbal instructions received from the Chief of Staff, the following résumé of campaigns against hostile Indians is submitted:

INTRODUCTION.

At the close of the year 1866 the War Department was greatly embarrassed by the fact that it was compelled to muster out all the Volunteers that had been organized during the Civil War before they could be replaced by the Regular troops for which Congress had provided. It was late in the year, and this prevented getting recruits for the Regular Army enlisted and sending them to remote frontier posts before the spring of 1867. This fact forced department commanders to use garrisons which were too small for the necessities of the case at hand during the winter months; but this was all that could be done. The winter of 1866–67 proved to be unprecedentedly severe, so that for long periods it was a physical impossibility to keep out the commands from such posts as Fort Phil Kearney, Fort F. C. Smith, Buford, Berthold, Camp Cooke, and others similarly situated. All these posts were located in country claimed by the Northern Sioux, who were more or less unfriendly.

The Territorial militia then supplied the deficiency in the Regular forces and rendered heroic service in defense of life and property against Indian hostilities which rightly should have devolved upon the General Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to speak for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWELL. I will.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What tribe of Indians was engaged in these hostilities against the whites?

Mr. HOWELL. They were the Pah-Utes and Navajoes, according to the report, and other disconnected and dissatisfied bands which were attracted by the success and quantity of plunder obtained by this young chief, Black Hawk, and joined with him carrying on the war.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. About how many battles did they have? What was the amount of hostilities? What length of time did it cover?

Mr. HOWELL. The warfare continued for three summers. In the wintertime the Indians would retreat through mountain fastnesses to their rendezvous on the junction of the San Juan and Green Rivers, too far remote to be followed and attacked by the settlers; but as soon as spring arrived they would go on the warpath and sweep down upon the defenseless inhabitants and drive off their cattle and murder, scalp, and burn.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Has the Government ever paid anything for the destruction of their property under the Indian depredation act?

Mr. HOWELL. I have no information as to whether any claims for the losses of property in Utah were ever paid. I know there are very many such claims growing out of Indian depredations which have been rejected under that law, because it could not be shown that Indians were in a state of amity with the United States, but were recognized to be on the warpath.

Mr. Chairman, I have shown that the Indian war fighters in Utah rendered the identical service performed by the regular troops in Indian disturbances, but it is contended that their service is not of record in the War Department and hence they have no pensionable status. In equity and good conscience, the circumstances under which they freely gave their service should give them the highest claim to the Nation's gratitude and bounty.

They were called out by the governor, the commander in chief of the militia, not in any way accountable to them but an appointee of the President, the commander in chief of the land and naval forces of the National Government. A Territory has no sovereignty and Territorial militia service under a Territorial governor is in substance and essence and effect Federal service, and there is a plain demarkation and differentiation between such service and the service of the militia of a sovereign State under the proper State authority.

These volunteers could not be mustered into the United States service; there was no recruiting officer within 500 miles, and besides it was no time or occasion to palter or hesitate. They acted with promptness and decision in the face of impending danger. They did not question or seek to evade the fray when the fateful emergency arose. They gave no thought to the regularity of their service or the idea that future recognition or reward might hinge upon their service being recorded in the archives of the War Department located in a far-off city. They did their duty fearlessly, faithfully, and fully in every crisis. They went bravely onto the battlefield against a foe that knew no code of ethics. Defeat meant cruel and torturing destruction to them and massacre to the helpless ones depending upon them for protection.

They counted not the cost nor thought of future reward. They only heard the call of duty and gave their youth and strength and valor to make secure the outpost of civilization. I have listened with delight and responsive heart to the eloquent tributes that have been paid this afternoon to the intrepid pioneer, who has blazed the trail and smoothed the way for the sandals of a more delicate civilization to follow. No one who has not had personal experience can sensibly appreciate the privations, hardships, and sacrifices of the pioneers who have achieved the "winning of the West." No one can sense the awful fear in the hearts of women and children on the frontier when Indian uprisings occurred or threatened. I have passed through that experience as a boy and know how the "minute men" were relied upon for safety.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is there any muster roll or anything, showing who these men were?

Mr. HOWELL. Oh, yes. The muster rolls of these campaigns are all in the archives of the State in Salt Lake City.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. How many men would it affect?

Mr. HOWELL. The Indian War Veterans' Association meets annually, but Old Father Time has been particularly busy in calling them home in recent years. Each succeeding annual encampment finds many absentees in the ranks. These wars occurred nearly 50 years ago, and a large majority of all that buoyant, intrepid band have answered the final roll call and joined their faithful comrades in their eternal home.

For 12 years they have been knocking at the doors of Congress for this just and deserved recognition for the heroic service they rendered in the long ago. Still the remnant of that valiant band trustingly look to Congress for just and merited relief. Imagine their disappointment and the astonishment that will be theirs and the grief that will come upon their hoary heads when, after waiting so long, they discover that they have been omitted from a bill of this character, intended as a "catchall" for every Indian campaign of importance throughout the country.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. About how many were enrolled?

Mr. HOWELL. I think from about two to four thousand.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Utah has expired.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, at the time the Committee on Pensions was considering this legislation the distinguished gentleman from Utah [Mr. HOWELL] appeared before the subcommittee and made a very earnest argument in support of the position which he now takes. The committee listened to him with a great deal of interest, but after mature consideration decided not to incorporate the amendment he suggests. I hope this committee will sustain the action of the Pension Committee and will vote down the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Utah [Mr. HOWELL].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. HOWELL. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 33.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 12, after the word "further," insert:
"That if any certain one of the said campaigns did not cover a period of 90 days the provisions of this act shall apply to those who served during the entire period of said campaign: Provided further."

Mr. GANDY. Now, Mr. Chairman, certain campaigns have been enumerated in this bill. The chairman of the committee, or, at least, the member of the committee who has the bill in charge, has told us that these are the campaigns that were considered of sufficient importance by the War Department and by the committee to receive attention here. Now, the provisions of the bill limits it to those who served 90 days, and, as a general proposition, perhaps that is right, but one of the campaigns that is enumerated in this bill did not cover a period of 90 days. I submit that it is not a fair proposition to take this campaign, wherein it is acknowledged that it was of sufficient importance to justify its enumeration in this act, and then deny those who participated in it the benefits that will accrue hereunder. It is not fair to say that because that campaign did not extend for 90 days those who participated in it should be denied a pensionable status under this bill. I ask that exception be made, so that where the campaign was not for 90 days the provisions of this act may extend to those who served during the entire campaign.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. GANDY].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. KEATING. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 48, noes 33.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Provided further, That the record of enlistment or muster into the service of the State of Texas, as evidenced by the muster roll and vouchers on file in the State archives at Austin, Tex., shall be accepted as full and satisfactory proof of such enlistment and service; and where it is shown that any such muster rolls or vouchers have been lost or destroyed, secondary evidence of their existence, contents, and loss may be made, and when so made shall have the same force and effect as the original rolls, and shall be accepted as full and satisfactory proof of the originals."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, in explanation of this, I will simply state it perfects the amendment heretofore adopted to this section, and, as the capitol at Austin has been destroyed, I believe, twice, some of these rolls will have to be produced by evidence under the rules of court.

I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I hope the House will not adopt this particular amendment. In section 2 of this bill we provide:

That the period of service performed by beneficiaries under this act shall be determined by reports from the records of the War Department, where there is such a record, and by the reports from the records of the Treasury Department showing payment by the United States where there is no record of regular enlistment or muster into the United States military service.

Now, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], with the assistance of his good friend from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY], through a mistake by the presiding officer of this committee, succeeded in getting an amendment into this bill which will give certain Texas troops a pensionable status. That was an amendment, Mr. Chairman, which was not germane, and which the Chair should have ruled out of order.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. KEATING. Pardon me. Now it is proposed to set up for these Texans—these men who, if the Chair had sustained the point of order, would not now be in the bill—a different standard from that set up for all the Indian fighters found elsewhere in the country. I presume that the gentleman wants this peculiar standard because they were not Indian fighters, and should not be in the bill. As a matter of fact, they seem to have directed their energies against Mexican marauders principally, and therefore he wants to arrange it so that even if the records are destroyed, if there are no State records, they may come in here and in various ways prove their claims. I trust that this House will vote down this amendment and preserve the essential features of a bill which the committee have prepared and presented in all seriousness.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I have looked, since the gentleman [Mr. MANN] mentioned the amendment a little while ago, at the wording of the amendment offered, and I confess that the three words in reference to the Mexican marauders were not in order. But I overlooked the form of the language. I am going to ask now unanimous consent to eliminate from my amendment those three words, "Mexican marauders and."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to strike from his amendment the words "Mexican marauders and." Is there objection?

Mr. KEATING. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, in what condition will that leave the amendment?

Mr. MURRAY. It will just leave "Indian depredations."

The CHAIRMAN. If the words "Mexican marauders and" are left out, the amendment would not be subject to a point of order. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out the words "Mexican marauders and."

Mr. MURRAY. So that it will read——

The Clerk reads as follows:

So that it will read, "Texas volunteers who served in defense of the frontiers of that State against Indian depredations."

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I do not object to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the words in the amendment "Mexican marauders and" be stricken out. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEATING. No, Mr. Chairman, I hope the House will judge these Indian fighters by exactly the same standard as is set up for other Indian fighters.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, with reference to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], there is no way, with this amendment pending, or in the bill, by which you can determine who were enlisted in Texas. This seeks to search the records at Austin, which the Government of the United States once before acknowledged and followed in the payment of expenses incurred by the State of Texas in those Indian depredations, and I apprehend that any man who wants to limit the possible pension would certainly want to fix upon the record upon which he would make claim. Therefore the amendment is essential and ought to be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. MURRAY. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 10, noes 46.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LONGWORTH: Page 3, line 8, after the word "include," insert the words "the surviving widows of all those sailors who in the late War with Mexico lost their lives at Vera Cruz and."

Mr. KEATING. I make a point of order on that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] makes a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I am sure that the gentleman does not wish to seriously make a point of order on this amendment. This was a war waged against Mr. Huerta, an Indian, a man with Indian blood in his veins, supported by many other Indians; and surely the justice and wisdom of this amendment must appeal to the hearts of gentlemen who are interested in providing for the widows of men who lost their lives in the service of their country.

The gentleman from Colorado should remember that there were more of our sailors who lost their lives during our late war with Mexico than lost their lives during the entire war with Spain, and I confidently hope, Mr. Chairman, that, since you have hitherto ruled that all amendments concerning wars with Indians are in order, that you will in your wisdom rule favorably upon my amendment. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman's knowledge of the pension laws of this country was as extensive as his wit is keen, he would know that the widows of those who fell at Vera Cruz are now entitled to a pension. I make a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. The the period of service performed by beneficiaries under this act shall be determined by reports from the records of the War Department, where there is such a record, and by the reports from the records of the Treasury Department showing payment by the United States where there is no record of regular enlistment or muster into the United States military service.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, on page 4, line 2, after the word "service."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SEARS: Page 4, line 2, after the word "service," at the end of the line, insert: "And provided further, That no person who owns real or personal property of the value of $5,000 or more, or who has an annual income of not less than $360, shall be paid a pension under the provisions of this act."

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the words "And" and "further" be stricken out before and after the word "provided."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, we would like to hear the amendment reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as proposed to be modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 4, by inserting, after the word "service," in line 2, the following: "Provided, That no person who owns real or personal property of the value of $5,000 or more, or who has an annual income of not less than $360, shall be paid a pension under the provisions of this act."

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, strike out the words "or more."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification suggested by the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. MANN. What is the modification?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "or more" after the figures "$5,000," so that the amendment will read: "That no person who owns real or personal property of the value of $5,000"——

Mr. MURRAY. And it should be "or annual income of not more than $360" instead of "not less than $360."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"or has an annual income of not more than $360."

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to discuss the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. SEARS. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 12, noes 46.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 19, after the word "void," add the following: "Provided, That no person who owns real or personal property of the value of $10,000 or more, or who has an annual income of more than $600, shall be paid a pension under the provisions of this act."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

By unanimous consent, Mr. RAKER, Mr. SMITH of Idaho, Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, Mr. KEATING, Mr. MCCRACKEN, Mr. GANDY, and Mr. SEARS were given leave to extend remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the growth of Nebraska since these Indian wars.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That section 4716 of the Revised Statutes, relating to loyalty during the Civil War, is hereby repealed so far as the same relates to this act or to pensioners under this act.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman in charge of the bill what are the provisions of section 4716 of the Revised Statutes?

Mr. KEATING. This is the provision:

No money on account of pensions shall be paid to any person, or to the widow, children, or heirs of any deceased person, who in any manner voluntarily engaged in or aided and abetted the late rebellion against the authority of the United States.

The thought that the committee had was that a great many ex-Confederate soldiers served in these Indian wars.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to state to the committee that the first amendment adopted was the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], which amended line 8, on page 2, after the word "inclusive." The second amendment was that offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], which was also after the word "inclusive."

Mr. MURRAY. That was the third amendment. The second amendment was that of the gentleman from Minnesota. The first amendment was mine.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was about to suggest that it should be made plain that the second amendment ought to follow the last word in the first amendment.

Mr. MANN. One follows the other. That goes without saying, without any order of the committee.

Mr. KEATING. My attention has been called to the fact that on page 2, in line 11, the word "eighteen" is misspelled. I ask unanimous consent that it may be corrected.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, unanimous consent is granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HARRISON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 655) to pension the survivors of certain Indian wars from 1865 to January, 1891, inclusive, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. KEATING. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to the final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Should not the title be amended to conform to the changes in the text?

The SPEAKER. The time to amend the title is after the bill is passed. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken, Mr. KINCHELOE demanded a division.

Pending the division,

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the point of no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 220, nays 108, answered "present" 2, not voting 104, as follows:

SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 17, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our heavenly Father, we come seeking Thy blessing that the light of Thy presence may be the light of our way in the duties of this day. Thy hand lifts the curtain of every new day, and companionship with Thee makes the path of duty a path of joy and of glory. Thy presence gives to us the inspiration of life. Thy presence guides the path to successful issue. Thy presence leads us in the achievement of our high ideals. Go Thou with us this day that the influence of Thy spirit may dwell in our hearts and minds, bringing us closer to Thyself, and thus bringing us closer to the duties that pertain to our earthly life. We ask for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PROHIBITION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA (S. DOC. NO. 318).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Acting Secretary of War, calling attention to the fact that the bill to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia contains no provision for the storing of alcohol for the Medical Department of the Army, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a copy of a letter addressed to the President of the United States by the publishers of American newspapers published in other languages than English, pledging support to the preparedness program, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I present a telegram in the nature of a memorial, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., February 15, 1916.

Senator JAMES A. O'GORMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The announcement of the central powers that armed merchantmen will be treated as men-of-war beginning with the 1st of March will involve United States in gravest crisis yet experienced unless Government defines attitude at once clearly and unmistakably.

Germans are not a nation of bluffers. We may have to face in another couple of weeks the serious situation of the vessel carrying American passengers will be sunk without warning, because such vessel was armed. Whatever policy United States may pursue in the matter it would be fateful for us to drift without taking clear and unambiguous stand before new catastrophe occurs.

If we defer decision until such time our course of action would depend not upon principles enunciated by Secretary of State in note to all belligerents on subject of submarine warfare, but on exigencies of the moment. We would be compelled in forming opinion to rely not upon indisputable facts, but upon highly colored partisan statements. Central powers having acknowledged justice of our contention that submarines must not destroy merchantmen without safeguarding lives of American passengers, it was clearly the duty of our Government to insist that lives of such American passengers shall not be jeopardized by the merchantmen themselves. There can be no greater danger for noncombatants than to place weapons capable of destroying hostile submarines into hands of captains of merchant vessels. The Government has wisely attempted to remove that peril by proposing international agreement for the disarming of merchantmen. Announcement of central powers is based on identical principle which is expounded and championed by United States. The idea of abolishing malpractice of arming merchantmen by common consent is, however, hardly feasible in times of world war. England bent on exterminating German submarines by every means, fair or foul, is not likely to abandon that malpractice by amicable settlement. The Government can not rest content with what it has done in this matter. If we desire to remove every possibility of friction, and if we desire to safeguard lives of our citizens, there is only one peaceful course open to us—the United States must declare without delay that citizens traveling on board of armed ships of belligerents do so at their own risk. This should apply not only to ships leaving American ports, but to all ships on the seven seas, no matter from what port they hail. If we permit American citizens to board vessels which, while leaving American harbors without armament, are armed at sea by warships, we shall only increase possibilities of disaster. We may not be able to compel belligerents to comply with our demand, although France already recognizes principle on which our attitude is based and refuses to arm her merchantmen; but at least we can deny protection to American citizens who, in spite of the perils with which their course is fraught, insist upon traveling on belligerent privateers unless allies will issue definite instructions to their merchantmen, forbidding them to carry arms or to resist capture. It seems only fair that citizens placing themselves under protection of the guns of a belligerent should for the time being be placed outside of protection of the United States.

FREDERICK FRANKLIN SCHRADER.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of the congregation of the East Congregational Church, of Concord, N. H., and a petition of J. H. Bliss and 19 other citizens, of Concord, N. H., praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Rev. Samuel S. Drury, of St. Paul's School, Concord, N. H., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit interstate commerce in the products of child labor, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks and a petition of the Mining Department of the American Federation of Labor, praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented a petition of sundry citizens of Corsicana, Tex., praying for an increase in armaments, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I present a resolution adopted by the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce on the subject of preparation for national defense. I ask that the resolution be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved by the directors of the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce, That the Representatives in Congress from Georgia be urged to secure at this session of Congress legislation that will materially increase both the military and Navy defense of the United States of America: Be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of this chamber of commerce be instructed to mail a copy of this resolution to each Member of the delegation in Congress from Georgia. Also to mail copies to the leading commercial organizations of this State, inviting them to pass similar resolutions, and requesting that copies be sent by them to the delegation in Congress from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have also resolutions adopted by the Georgia Manufacturers' Association with reference to the child-labor bill, which I ask be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GEORGIA MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION,
February 10, 1916.

Resolution.

Whereas there is pending in the National Congress certain proposed legislation regulatory of female and child-labor employment throughout the United States, which is made applicable to manufacturing interests employing adult female and minor help in the manufacture of articles entering into interstate commerce, such proposed legislation being embodied in Senate bills 519, 520, and 1083, and House bills 666 and 6870; and

Whereas it is believed the principle of control suggested in such legislation is revolutionary in character, the grant of power to the Federal Government for the enactment of such legislation being based upon a strained interpretation of the Constitution of the United States delegating to Congress the power to regulate interstate commerce; and

Whereas if this prescribed power be given to Congress, Federal control may be exercised over State sovereignties to the extent of denying the right of shipment, except upon authority of Federal statute on any interstate route of any commodity in the manufacture of which proscribed adult female or child labor has been employed, resulting in the obliteration of State jurisdiction over local enterprises, for the reason that scarcely no manufacturer ever confines his market place to the borders of a single State; and

Whereas legislation governing female and child labor has made steady, if slow, progress as a matter of State legislation, and has all but accomplished its primary standards throughout the Union, evincing a desire on the part of separate sovereignties to enact fair and proper statutory regulations governing such employment: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Georgia Manufacturers' Association in annual convention assembled protests the passage of these several proposed bills now pending in Congress, for reasons made patent in the foregoing preambles, and petitions the Honorables HOKE SMITH and THOMAS W. HARDWICK, representing the State of Georgia in the United States Senate, and each and every Members of the House of Representatives from Georgia, to oppose their passage; and

Resolved further, That a copy of these preambles and resolutions, duly authenticated by the president and secretary of this association, be sent to each Senator in the National Congress representing the State of Georgia, and to each and every Representative in the House of Representatives, representing respective congressional districts in the State.

WM. W. DORNE, Secretary.

Attest: A true copy, as agreed to and passed.

THOS. K. GUNN, President.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have a resolution passed by the Seattle Commercial Club with reference to the vocational education bill which is now upon our calendar. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION.

SEATTLE COMMERCIAL CLUB.

GENTLEMEN: The committee to whom was referred the communication by Mr. D. D. Johnson regarding the Smith-Hughes bill, begs leave to report as follows:

The Smith-Hughes bill is the work of a commission on national aid to vocational education, created by act of Congress, approved January 20, 1914, authorizing the President of the United States to appoint a commission of nine members to consider the subject of national aid for vocational education.

Pursuant to this act the President of the United States appointed the following persons to serve as members of the commission: Senator Hoke Smith, Georgia; Senator Carroll S. Page, Vermont; Representative D. M. Hughes, Georgia; Representative S. D. Fess, Ohio; John A. Lapp, director Indiana Bureau of Legislative Information, Indianapolis, Ind., secretary of Indiana Commission on Industrial Agricultural Education, 1912; Miss Florence M. Marshall, director Manhattan Trade School, New York City, member of Massachusetts Factory Inspection Commission, 1910; Miss Agnes Nestor, president International Glove Workers' Union, Chicago, Ill., member Committee on Industrial Education, American Federation of Labor; Charles A. Prosser, secretary National Society for the Promotion of Industrial Education, New York City; Charles H. Winslow, special agent Bureau of Labor Statistics, Washington, D. C., member of Massachusetts Commission on Industrial Education, 1906 to 1909.

The Smith-Hughes bill is to provide for the promotion of vocational education; to provide for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such education in agriculture and the trades and industries; to provide for cooperation with the States in the preparation of teachers of vocational subjects; and to appropriate money and regulate its expenditure.

The schools to be aided in part by the National Government must be—

1. Schools supported and controlled by the public.
2. The instruction given in them must be of less than college grade.
3. They should be designed to prepare boys and girls over 14 years of age for useful or profitable employment in agriculture, in the trades and industries, and in home economics.
4. The schools should be of three types in order to meet a variety of needs:

(a) All-day schools in which practically half of the time should be given to actual practice for a vocation on a useful or productive basis.

(b) Part-time schools for young workers over 14 years of age, which should extend either their vocational knowledge or give preparation for entrance to a vocation or extend the general civic or vocational intelligence of the pupils.

(c) Evening schools to extend the vocational knowledge for mature workers over 16 years of age.

When we consider the two very significant finding of the commission, namely:

1. In this whole country there are fewer trade schools than exist in the little German Kingdom of Bavaria, with a population but little greater than that of New York City.

2. Until the outbreak of the European war more workers were being trained at public expense in the city of Munich than in all the larger cities of the United States put together, although these American cities include a population of 12,000,000; and when we consider, further, that at least 2,000,000 boys and girls in this country, between the ages of 14 and 16, are working for wages, that they are unskilled, and that yearly 1,000,000 young people are required simply to maintain the ranks of our working population, we are constrained to urge most forcibly the passage of this measure and to request that the resolution be brought to the attention of the entire Washington delegation in Congress.

Respectfully submitted.

COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION, SEATTLE COMMERCIAL CLUB.
Per OTTO L. LUTHER, Chairman.

Adopted by the Seattle Commercial Club in regular session, January 25, 1916.

Mr. BANKHEAD presented petitions of sundry citizens of Bessemer, Ala., praying for an increase in armaments, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Hammond, Ind., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the issuance of passports to Americans traveling on vessels of belligerent nations, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of the Society of Friends of Farmland, Ind., remonstrating against an increase in armaments, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. VARDAMAN presented a petition of the Antisaloon League of Jackson, Miss., and a petition of sundry citizens of Gulfport, Miss., praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MYERS. I present a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Polson, Mont., praying for an adequate appropriation for the Flathead reclamation project in that State. I ask that the memorial be printed in the RECORD, together with the signatures, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

POLSON, MONT., February 10, 1916.

To the PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: The Polson Chamber of Commerce, from which comes this communication, represents the common interests of the people of the city of Polson, Mont., and of the Lower Flathead Valley, its tributary territory, which territory is identical with that embraced within the Flathead reclamation project.

The Flathead project is under the jurisdiction of the United States for the Flathead Indians, and is the largest Indian reclamation project in the country, embracing the proposed irrigation of 152,000 acres of highly fertile lands, which, when supplied with water, will give as great production per acre as any section of the United States.

The entrymen on the tracts thereunder made settlement under the implied promise and pledge from the Government to have water available for use thereon within a reasonable time; but, though the project was begun in 1909, it is now but 22 per cent completed. As a result of this dilatory action on the part of the Government, these settlers are facing ruin, and many have been forced to abandon their lands. The entire cost of the complete project is estimated at $6,500,000; to June, 1915, but $1,600,000 had been appropriated, fixing the blame for this delay upon Congress in their failure to make larger appropriations.

No reasonable objection can be offered by Congress to a request for a substantial appropriation at this session for the completion of this project. The feasibility of the reclamation scheme and the value resulting from the irrigation of these lands is unquestioned, and all of the money used in connection therewith is reimbursable either to the Government or to the Indian fund, depending upon the source derived, the construction and maintenance cost standing as a lien upon each tract for its pro rata share of it.

It is apparent from the rate that appropriations have been made that it will require 25 years to complete the project. The Montana delegation is asking for a $1,000,000 appropriation at this session. The Polson Chamber of Commerce is leading a campaign to secure this money, and the magnitude of the loss resulting from delay and, on the other hand, the prosperity that will come from the completion of the project has been so apparent that it has had in this effort to secure the appropriation the active cooperation of almost every large commercial body in the Northwest.

We earnestly urge upon Congress the justice and economy of appropriating this amount for the Flathead project at this session, and we can not believe that so rightful a demand will be disregarded.

Respectfully submitted.

THE POLSON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
By C. M. SAWYER, President.
WALTER E. CHILD, Secretary.

Mr. KERN. I desire to have two telegrams in the nature of petitions printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TERRE HAUTE, IND., February 12, 1916.

Hon. JOHN W. KERN,
Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The undersigned bankers of Terre Haute, Ind., earnestly urge you to vigorously oppose Senate bill No. 1082. We believe any such legislation at this time will only add to the already overburdened manufacturing interests of the country and both directly and indirectly adversely affect our whole business fabric. Besides, we are opposed to the principles involved in this class legislation. We already have too much legislation of the destructive kind. Let us have a rest.

JOHN L. CRAWFORD,

HEIRS OF FRANCIS BUSCH, DECEASED.

Mr. BRYAN, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 3927) for the relief of the legal representatives of Francis Busch, deceased, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, which was agreed to.

PORT OF JACKSONVILLE, FLA.

Mr. SIMMONS. From the Committee on Finance I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 4506) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880, and I submit a report (No. 150) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] to the bill.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. I may state in submitting the request that the act extends to the port of Jacksonville, Fla., the provisions of the act of June 10, 1880, relating to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods. The bill received the favorable report of the committee in the last Congress, and there is a favorable report from the department stating that, in the opinion of the department, the bill ought to be passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SNAKE RIVER BRIDGE, IDAHO.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 3873) to authorize the counties of Minidoka and Cassia, State of Idaho, to construct a bridge across Snake River, and I submit a report (No. 151) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. BORAH. I rose to make the same request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALE OF OLD POST-OFFICE BUILDING AT DAYTON, OHIO.

Mr. SWANSON. From the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 322) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to sell the old post office and site thereof in the city of Dayton, Ohio. I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] to the bill.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. The new Dayton post-office building has been completed and is occupied. The old building simply stands unoccupied and is of no use whatever to the Government. The citizens of Dayton are very anxious that the Treasury Department shall dispose of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. PAGE:

A bill (S. 4527) granting an increase of pension to George T. Conner (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

OSAGE OIL LANDS.

Mr. LANE. I introduce a joint resolution. I should like to have it read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 100) calling upon the Secretary of the Interior to adopt a royalty system in place of a bonus and royalty system in the sale of leases on the Osage oil lands was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas it is the policy of the Department of the Interior to sell leases to operate oil and gas wells upon the lands of the Osage Indians in Oklahoma to the person or persons who tender the largest cash bonus over and above a royalty fixed by the President of the United States; and

Whereas this policy must necessarily and actually does exclude and prohibit the vast majority of the citizens of this country from bidding upon and securing leases of such lands for lack of the spot cash to pay the bonus; and

Whereas such discrimination eliminates many worthy persons from the bidding who could and would operate the property with profit to the Indians and to themselves if permitted to do so; and

Whereas the spot-cash bonus policy operates to the sole advantage of persons of large means who have or can securely ready cash; and

Whereas it is a policy which is mystifying and renders it uncertain whether the Osage Indians secure the best price or even a fair price for the use of their lands; and

Whereas if a policy of leasing the lands and receiving tenders upon the basis of a fixed percentage or so-called "royalty" based upon the output of such wells were adopted; and

Whereas the plan of leasing lands on a percentage of its production is so simple, so well known, and so fair in taking care of the property rights and equities of both the lessees and the owners of the lands and affords an opportunity to secure free, fair, and unlimited open competition for the sale of the aforesaid leases of the oil and gas lands of the Osage Indians without guessing or loss to anyone: Therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, requested to adopt the policy of leasing such lands on royalties only, and to defer the sale of all leases upon the aforesaid lands until such time as he can definitely and certainly ascertain the actual value of the oil and gas wells now operating in the Osage Indians' oil field and then sell leases of the same to the person or persons offering the highest bid based on a percentage or royalty basis to such person or persons who give a good and sufficient bond to guarantee the faithful performance of their contracts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

THE REGULAR ARMY.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I desire to offer to the military bill. I am aware of the fact that the military bill has not been reported, but I wish the proposed amendment to be referred to the committee that it may be considered while they are considering the bill itself. I ask that the amendment be read.

The proposed amendment was read, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. SMITH of Georgia to the bill (S. —) for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes:

"SEC. —. That the Regular Army of the United States shall consist of 250,000 enlisted men. The increase herein provided shall continue until September 1, 1921.

"SEC. —. On and after the passage of this act the enlistment period shall be six years, unless sooner terminated by competent authority, two years with the colors and four years in a reserve: Provided, That no person who is less than 17 years of age or more than 26 years of age, and who has not completed a course in a grammar school, shall be eligible for enlistment in the Regular Army.

"SEC. —. That for the purpose of assisting the military and naval authorities in recruiting the Army and Navy, the President is hereby authorized to utilize the services of the postmasters throughout the United States as assistants to the recruiting officers of the Army and Navy under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe.

"SEC. —. That members of the reserve shall report twice each year to their postmasters and shall receive $10 a year while members of the reserve, and shall only be subject to call to the colors in case of actual war or when war is imminent.

"SEC. —. That in addition to the work not connected with the military service soldiers on active duty hereafter enlisting shall devote 96 hours monthly to study and to receiving instructions upon educational lines not directly connected with the military service, but preparatory to their return to civil life. A part of this preparation for civil life shall consist of vocational education, either in the agricultural or the mechanical arts, and civilian teachers may be employed to aid the Army officers in conducting the said educational work.

"SEC. —. The provisions of this act shall be carried out under rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the President."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to add just a word of explanation.

An army of 250,000 men with the colors and 125,000 of them going each year to the reserves for four year, would make available at the end of five years 500,000 trained reservists in addition to the Regular Army.

If the two years' training with the colors could be made also a training school for civil life, with vocational instruction included, the service would be greatly elevated and it would be sought by more than the number allowed.

If the Army officers are called upon to aid the preparation not only for war but for peace; if they accept this as a part of their service following graduation at West Point and Annapolis, can anyone doubt that their high sense of duty will bring a great contribution to the preparation for peaceful pursuits?

The young men serving for two years with the colors should be furnished opportunity while there to grow in mind and character.

The provisions for the use of postmasters in the recruiting service is suggested by the testimony of Gen. Edwards before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs. He pointed out that other countries employ civilian officials to supplement the work of the military authorities to keep up the personnel of their military establishments. I feel sure the postmasters of the country would gladly respond to any call made upon them to assist in giving an adequate Army and Navy. If the military authorities can use them, they would be only too glad to fill any place in the national system of defense that may be assigned to them.

I have no doubt the present recruiting service both of the Army and the Navy is highly efficient, but its facilities are limited. With the plan of using the postmasters, a young man could call at his post office and secure information as to the terms under which he could enlist. This would also provide a greatly improved system of enlistment in the event of war.

But the chief feature of the suggestion is that the two years with the colors be used equally to train the young men who enlist for the peaceful pursuits of life as well as for service in case of war.

The service with the colors should be made a preparation for both peace and war, built upon plans that will be of real benefit to the men who enlist. The young men while with the colors should be encouraged to save half their pay, or it might be reduced and the pay while with the reserves proportionately increased.

I present these suggestions hoping that the policy of preparing the men with the colors for civil life may, at least in some shape, become a part of any plan adopted for an increase of the Army.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT.

Mr. NORRIS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. KENYON submitted three amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE submitted three amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. HUSTING submitted five amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. THOMPSON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $10,000 for the construction of bridges across the Big Soldier Creek and Little Soldier Creek within the Pottawatomie Indian Reservation, Jackson County, Kans., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill (H. R. 10385), which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GRONNA submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to withdraw from the Treasury Department of the United States from time to time in his discretion all moneys derived from the sale and disposition of surplus lands within the limits of the former Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, N. Dak., arising under the provisions of the act approved June 1, 1910, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill (H. R. 10385), which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

ARTICLE OF DR. ALLERTON S. CUSHMAN.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to an article upon the rôle of chemistry in the war by Dr. Allerton S. Cushman, director of the Institute of Industrial Research. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing that they may consider the advisability of having it printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That action will be taken.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO (S. DOC. NO. 324).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the Senate:

In response to the resolution adopted by the Senate on January 6, 1916, requesting the President to inform the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interests, upon certain subjects respecting the situation in Mexico, and to transmit to the Senate the documents, letters, reports, orders, etc., therein referred to, I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers.

The report of the Secretary of State has my approval.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 17, 1916.

Mr. STONE. I ask that the message and accompanying papers lie on the table and be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REPORT OF PANAMA RAILROAD CO. (S. DOC. NO. 325).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying paper and illustrations, was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress the sixty-sixth annual report of the board of directors of the Panama Railroad Co. for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1915.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 17, 1916.

MARY MEYER.

Mr. STONE obtained the floor.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Missouri to yield to me in order that I may ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a resolution reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The resolution has been on the calendar for some time. It proposes to pay a sum equal to six months' salary to the niece of a late employee of the Senate. There is never any contest or discussion upon resolutions of this character. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate resolution 75.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I shall not object.

The resolution (S. Res. 75) was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Mary Meyer, niece of Jacob C. Donaldson, late a skilled laborer in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 45 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT JUDGES.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 706) to amend section 260 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, which is the first bill on the calendar that is pressed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order. Senate bill 1053 is the first on the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that may go over.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My motion was that we proceed with No. 18, which is the first bill on the calendar that is being pressed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia. [Putting the question.]

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask for a division.

Mr. GALLINGER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRYAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and therefore refrain from voting.

Mr. FALL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. I see that he has not voted, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. HARDING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KERN. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY]. He is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. LIPPITT (after having voted in the negative). Owing to the absence of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], with whom I have a pair, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. I should like to have this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. STONE. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. REED. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I inquire whether the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have a pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HARDING. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] is paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]; that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]; and that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 21, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 706) to amend section 260 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 260 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 260. When any judge of any court of the United States, appointed to hold his office during good behavior, resigns his office, after having held a commission or commissions as judge of any such court or courts at least 10 years continuously, and having attained the age of 70 years, he shall, during the residue of his natural life, receive the salary which is payable at the time of his retirement for the office that he held at the time of his resignation.

"In the event any circuit judge, having so held a commission or commissions at least 10 years continuously, and having attained the age of 70 years as aforesaid, shall nevertheless remain in office, the President, if in his opinion the public good so requires, may appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, an additional circuit judge of said circuit, who, notwithstanding the incumbency of the judge so entitled to resign, shall sit customarily as one of the judges of the circuit court of appeals of his circuit. And the judge so entitled to resign shall thenceforth be relieved, save as hereinafter provided, from the duty imposed by section 118 of this title to sit as one of the judges of said circuit court of appeals, and shall be held and treated as if junior in commission to the remaining judges of said court, who shall, in the order of the seniority of their respective commissions, exercise such powers and perform such duties as by law may be incident to seniority: Provided, That the presiding judge of the said circuit court of appeals, whenever in his judgment the public good shall so require, may thereafter, from time to time, designate the judge so entitled to resign to sit upon the hearing of any cause or causes in the said circuit court of appeals. And the Chief Justice of the United States may, upon like occasion, thereafter designate and appoint any such circuit judge so entitled to resign to service upon the circuit court of appeals of any other circuit; and he may likewise be designated and appointed, as provided by section 18 of this title, to hold a district court in any district, either within or without his said circuit.

"In the event any such judge of a district court of the United States, having so held a commission or commissions at least 10 years continuously, and having attained the age of 70 years as aforesaid, shall nevertheless remain in office, the President, if in his opinion the public good so requires, may appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, an additional judge of such court, who, notwithstanding the incumbency of the judge so entitled to resign, shall preside customarily over the said district court, and shall exercise such powers as are vested by law in the judge thereof. And the district judge so entitled to resign shall thenceforth be relieved, save as hereinafter provided, from service therein: Provided, That the said district judge so entitled to resign as aforesaid may be designated and appointed from time to time to hold any district court, either in his district or within or without his circuit, as provided by sections 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17 of this title, or to sit in the circuit court of appeals of his circuit, as provided by section 120 of this title.

"Upon the death or resignation of any circuit or district judge so entitled to resign, following the appointment of any additional judge as herein provided, the vacancy caused by such death or resignation of the said judge so entitled to resign shall not be filled, but the number of judges then in office shall be reduced accordingly."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, this bill has the support of some Members of the Senate for whom I have the utmost respect, and for that reason I hesitate to characterize it in a manner that I think the measure itself would justify. I content myself by saying that I believe it is the most remarkable bill that has been presented since I have been a Member of this body. The title of it ought to be changed; it ought to be entitled "A bill to authorize the Democratic President of the United States to create 17 judgeships and appoint 17 deserving Democrats to fill them," because that is what the bill means. It proposes to amend section 260 of the Judicial Code so that that section, if amended, will read as follows:

SEC. 260. When any judge of any court of the United States, appointed to hold his office during good behavior, resigns his office, after having held a commission or commissions as judge of any such court or courts at least 10 years continuously, and having attained the age of 70 years, he shall, during the residue of his natural life, receive the salary which is payable at the time of his retirement for the office that he held at the time of his resignation.

Thus far in the bill the language of the existing law has been repeated. The Constitution provides that judges shall be appointed to hold office during good behavior; which means that, if they behave themselves, they shall hold office as long as they live. It was, however, long ago recognized that judges sometimes become superannuated, but that they would sometimes hesitate to resign in spite of the fact that they were superannuated, because that would mean the loss of their livelihood. It was also recognized that under the Constitution Congress was powerless to compel them to resign, or, rather, was powerless to deprive them of their office, simply on account of the fact that they had reached an age when they were no longer capable of discharging their full duties as judges. So, very wisely, we provided many years ago that when a judge had reached the age of 70 years he might retire on full pay, provided that he had served full 10 years on the bench. That law, I think, has been in existence almost from the foundation of the Government. Perhaps the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] can refresh my memory about that. At any rate, it has been in operation for over a hundred years, and I think almost from the beginning of the Government. It has worked well.

It has occasionally happened that a judge has reached the age of 70 years; that he was incapable of rendering the same service that he had been able to render when he was younger; but that still he desired to remain in active life and was willing to discharge the duties of his office to the extent of his strength. That has occurred several times in the history of the Government, and has occurred three or four times since I have been a Member of the Senate. Whenever that has occurred, there has never been the slightest difficulty in procuring the passage of a special act of Congress authorizing the President to appoint an additional judge in that particular district to assist the judge, who, because of advancing years, was unable to do all the work.

That was done in the case of Maryland, I remember very distinctly. A few years ago a judge in that State had reached the age of 70 years; he did not want to retire absolutely; he was willing to work to the full extent of his strength, and yet he realized he could not do all of the work of the district; that he could not do as much work as he had been in the habit of doing; and we provided an additional judge in order that the new judge might take the burden of the responsibility of the office, but have from the incumbent such assistance in the trial of cases and in the disposition of judicial matters as he was able to render.

We provided in that case, as in all of these special cases, that, when there was a vacancy in the office of the older judge, no successor should be appointed. So the effect of it was that we had the advantage of the services of the older judge, to the extent that he could render them and as long as he felt able to render them, and that when he passed away or resigned the new appointee took the business alone; but that never has been done except upon a full inquiry upon the part of Congress as to the facts, and has never been done until Congress was satisfied that there was real occasion for it. This bill proceeds:

In the event any circuit judge, having so held a commission or commissions at least 10 years continuously, and having attained the age of 70 years as aforesaid, shall nevertheless remain in office, the President, if in his opinion the public good so requires, may appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, an additional circuit judge of said circuit, who, notwithstanding the incumbency of the judge so entitled to resign, shall sit customarily as one of the judges of the circuit court of appeals of his circuit. And the judge so entitled to resign shall thenceforth be relieved, save as hereinafter provided, from the duty imposed by section 118 of this title to sit as one of the judges of said circuit court of appeals, and shall be held and treated as if junior in commission to the remaining judges of said court—

That is, the old judge, who has served faithfully for all these years, is relegated to the rear, is treated as junior in commission. The bill continues—who shall in the order of the seniority of their respective commissions, exercise such powers and perform such duties as by law may be incident to seniority: Provided, That the presiding judge of the said circuit court of appeals, whenever in his judgment the public good shall so require, may thereafter, from time to time, designate the judge so entitled to resign to sit upon the hearing of any cause or causes in the said circuit court of appeals. And the Chief Justice of the United States may, upon like occasion, thereafter designate and appoint any such circuit judge so entitled to resign to service upon the circuit court of appeals of any other circuit; and he may likewise be designated and appointed, as provided by section 18 of this title, to hold a district court in any district, either within or without his said circuit.

That is the provision of the bill with reference to filling places upon the circuit bench. Then the bill proceeds with reference to district courts, and provides:

In the event any such judge of a district court of the United States, having so held a commission or commissions, at least 10 years continuously, and having attained the age of 70 years as aforesaid, shall nevertheless remain in office, the President, if in his opinion the public good so requires, may appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, an additional judge of such court, who, notwithstanding the incumbency of the judge so entitled to resign, shall preside customarily over the said district court, and shall exercise such powers as are vested by law in the judge thereof. And the district judge so entitled to resign shall thenceforth be relieved, save as hereinafter provided, from service therein: Provided, That the said district judge so entitled to resign as aforesaid may be designated and appointed from time to time to hold any district court, either in his district or within or without his circuit, as provided by sections 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17 of this title, or to sit in the circuit court of appeals of his circuit, as provided by section 120 of this title.

Upon the death or resignation of any circuit or district judge so entitled to resign, following the appointment of any additional judge as herein provided, the vacancy caused by such death or resignation of the said judge so entitled to resign shall not be filled, but the number of judges then in office shall be reduced accordingly.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if he is reading from this bill?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am reading from the proposed bill.

Mr. KENYON. I want to ask the Senator if it applies to the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No.

Mr. KENYON. Is there not the same reason for applying it to them as to circuit judges?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I presume there is, but it is limited to district and circuit judges.

Mr. KENYON. As I understand the Senator, there are 17 situations where this bill would apply.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not at the present moment; but my information is—and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] will correct me if I do not state it accurately—that there are now holding positions in the various circuits of the country 7 circuit judges who have passed the age of 70 and who would come under the provisions of this bill, and 7 district judges who have already passed the age of 70 who would come under the operations of the bill, making 14 altogether. There are in addition, I understand, three other judges who will have passed the age of 70 and will come under the operations of the bill before the present administration goes out of power on the 4th of March, 1917, which will be the case, as we all devoutly hope and expect.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that I have a list here of the judges of the district and circuit courts, and, as a matter of fact, if this bill is enacted into law, it will allow 14 circuit judges and 14 district judges to be appointed by the present administration.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, no.

Mr. NELSON. I have the list here.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. So have I.

Mr. NELSON. It has been furnished by the Department of Justice, and that is the number that may be appointed during President Wilson's term.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the Senator is mistaken. I have the list, and my figures correspond with the figures of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. NELSON. I said "during the term of President Wilson" he will have the appointment under this bill, or could appoint, 14 circuit and 14 district judges. As I have said, I have the list furnished me by the Department of Justice, giving the ages of these men.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I think the Senator is mistaken. I also have the list furnished by the department, and I think it shows that seven district and seven circuit judges are now eligible for the change, and that there will be two or three more before the end of this administration. I will go over the list again. I have gone over it, and I agree with the figures given by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It may be that some of these judges have been aging more rapidly lately under this administration.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator, as I am very much interested in this very remarkable bill, another question. The bill reads:

If in his opinion—

That is, the opinion of the President—

the public good so requires, he may appoint—

And so forth.

Is there not some resolution pending as a companion piece to this bill to investigate as to the Federal judges who are not able to carry on their work?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There is a resolution on the calendar, which was presented by the Senator's colleague [Mr. CUMMINS] and which was reported by the Judiciary Committee favorably some time ago.

Mr. KENYON. Would it not reassure the judge who holds the position to have the report of that committee on his competence if the President should decide the public good requires that another appointment should be made? Would that not make it less injurious to his feelings? Is there any minority report from the Judiciary Committee on this bill?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There is no minority report; that is, the minority has not filed a written report; but I will say to the Senator from Iowa in that connection—and I think I am justified in so saying—that this bill is the first bill in my experience that has ever been treated in the Judiciary Committee as a partisan measure. That Committee, as well as the Committee on Foreign Relations, has been singularly free from all partisanship. We have had before us many important questions during my time, and I do not recall a single measure except this when there was a clean division along party lines with reference to it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I will correct his statement. When we first voted, when the first report was made and brought in, it was unanimous, two of the Republicans joining with the Democrats.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. When was that?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But later on Senators seemed to make a party issue out of it and consolidated the Republicans. I will say further that the Judiciary Committee of the other House has at this session unanimously reported in favor of this bill, and it did so also at the last session of Congress.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If that be correct—and, of course, I do not undertake to dispute the statement of the Senator from Georgia—I am afraid that originally in the committee the gentle and persuasive tongue of the Senator from Georgia was the means of concealing what now appear to be the iniquities of the bill, but upon further consideration of it they were discovered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I want to ask the Senator if the bill did not originate with Attorney General McReynolds, now a justice of the Supreme Court?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not know.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And was it not substantially recommended by his report of three years ago? Was not that the origin of the bill, and is not Mr. McReynolds as far from being a partisan as any man who ever sat on the bench? He came into the service under a Republican administration as Assistant Attorney General, and then was made Attorney General under a Democratic administration.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If that is material, which I do not think it is, he was appointed to do some special work under a Republican administration, as I remember; and I recall with some regret—not that particular instance, because I think it was a very wise choice—but I recall with some regret that under that particular Republican administration we had a good many Democrats in responsible positions. I have always thought it was an unwise practice.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think I ought to say, as I interrupted the Senator, that what I really meant was not to designate the politics of the former Attorney General, but to indicate that he was about as nonpartisan in the performance of his duties as any public official could well be.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have no doubt about that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is what I really meant. I should not have undertaken to designate him as a member of any party, because I presume that he is a Democrat.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have the greatest possible respect for the former Attorney General, now Justice McReynolds. I think he is not only a man of very great ability, but a man of the highest honor and integrity, and, of course, I have no sort of intention of reflecting on him in anything I have said. But the fact remains that this bill was reported out of the Judiciary Committee by a partisan vote, every Democrat on the committee voting for it and every Republican voting against it. Whoever may have been responsible for it at the beginning, that is the situation now.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that I am very sorry that was the case. I regret that the Republicans on the committee allowed it to become a party measure.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Republicans upon the committee, who are usually unsuspicious, finally had their suspicions awakened and began to see the true inwardness of the measure, and when they did they very naturally objected to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I rose to suggest that I think we are getting in the habit in the Senate of making reports which on their face seem to be the action of the committee, while a strong minority is opposed to the bill, but the minority does not make a dissenting report.

When this bill was first brought to my attention I read it, saw that it was reported from the committee, and really supposed that it was unanimously reported by the committee. Had a minority report been made I would have been well informed on the matter. I am here now for the purpose of listening to a debate to enlighten me upon this subject, upon which I would have been enlightened heretofore had the Republican members filed a dissenting report on the bill.

I think it is a bad practice—and I notice we have fallen into it quite frequently during this session of Congress—simply to put a bill on the calendar as reported from a committee when there is a strong minority opposed to it.

I will venture now to ask the Senator from Utah if anything has occurred, so far as the judiciary or the country is concerned, of an unusual nature different from what has been happening in the past that seems to create a demand for legislation of this character?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Nothing that I am aware of, Mr. President. There are, so I am told, one or two cases where the judge has become superannuated and almost entirely incapable of discharging the duties of his office. But that is an exceptional situation, and all that is necessary to be done in order to rectify it is for the Senator from the State affected to present a bill providing for an additional judge in that district, and it will be passed, as was done in the case of Maryland, and as has always been done in cases that have been called to our attention.

This bill, however, is a wholesale proposition. It put it into the absolute discretion of the President to appoint at once these 14 judges. It is a very loose phrase and a very accommodating phrase to say "if, in his opinion, the public good so requires."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The recommendation of Justice McReynolds, when Attorney General, was that the President should be required, without any discretion whatever, to make the appointment. This bill puts in the discretionary feature, when the recommendation of the Attorney General was that it should be mandatory.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The bill originally recommended would be still more objectionable than this. This is bad enough; that would be still more objectionable. We know how these things are done. Without reflecting upon the integrity of any President—which of course I do not intend to do, and nobody intends to do—the President can not be present in every one of these districts. He can not know all about them. There is political pressure for the appointment of a judge, and there is little doubt in my mind that if this bill is passed every one of these positions will be filled.

I undertake to say that in many of them, if not in most of them, there is absolutely no occasion whatever for filling them. Because a man reaches the age of 70 years it does not at all follow that he is incapable of discharging the duties of an office. Some of the best work that ever has been done in this world has been done by men who had passed the age of 70. Some of the best work done in this body has been done by men who had passed the age of threescore and ten. It does not follow at all that because a man has reached that age he ought to be retired from the public service. That ought to be left to him. If he feels that by reason of his age he is unable to discharge the duties of his office, as a man of sense he would retire and permit another judge to take his place. If he is unable to discharge fully all of the duties of his office, then it would be made known, and assistance in the way of an additional judge could be provided.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if there is any legal objection to compelling retirement at the age of 70? I do not mean by that question to indicate that I favor it at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think there is. I stated in the beginning that the provision of the Constitution is that the judge shall hold his office during good behavior. That, of course, means for life, if he so long behaves himself; in other words, that the office shall only be made vacant so long as he lives for misbehavior on the part of the judge. Reaching the age of 70, of course, is not misbehavior.

Mr. KENYON. No. Of course this bill is a sort of delicate suggestion to the judge to retire at the age of 70. Now, if it could be legally done, it seems to me, it would be much better to say so than to make this suggestion to him. I agree with the Senator, of course, that some of the best work in this body and some of the best work on the bench is done after men reach the age of 70; but it seems to me this bill is rather a reflection upon the Federal judges in its suggestion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Can the Senator speak a little louder? I do not hear him.

Mr. KENYON. I can. I did not know anybody was paying any attention. I say it seems to me this bill is rather a reflection upon the judge who has reached the age of 70 and passed that age, if he is carrying on good work. If we are to retire judges at 70—and there may be some argument in favor of that—I think we had better do it directly, rather than by indirection.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I quite agree with the Senator. I do not believe we have the power to do it, and I doubt the wisdom of doing it.

Mr. KENYON. Some of the strongest judges now on the Supreme Bench of the United States have passed the age of 70 years, have they not?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, yes. The Chief Justice has passed that age.

Mr. KENYON. And two other justices?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Two other justices have passed that age. The former Chief Justice, Mr. Fuller, had passed the age of 70 and I think had nearly reached the age of 80 before his death. He was vigorous and rendering good service.

Mr. KENYON. And Justice Harlan?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Justice Harlan was long past the age of 70. I think the very large majority of these judges who are now past the age of 70 are rendering good service. The senior judge in the eighth circuit, Judge Sanborn, I think has reached the retiring age, yet he is strong and vigorous. This bill would permit the President to relegate him to the rear, make him junior, and appoint a new man, upon the theory that he is unable fully to discharge the duties and responsibilities of his office.

Mr. KENYON. Of course, any self-respecting judge would then resign.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, no, Mr. President; I think not.

Mr. KENYON. To be put to the rear?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The recommendations of the Attorney General were brought to my attention by a judge who did not want to retire, but did want an additional judge appointed in order that he might, to the extent of his ability, serve without actual retirement.

Mr. KENYON. That might be true in a few cases.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have had several of the judges express to me their desire for the passage of this bill, feeling unable to continue longer with the full responsibility of the office, but desiring to do special work to the extent of their ability, when called on, instead of retiring with full salary.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Georgia understands quite well that where such cases as that exist they have only to be called to the attention of Congress, when a special bill will be passed.

In addition to the practical objections that are made to the bill, I think it is, to say the least, of gravely doubtful constitutional validity. The Constitution of the United States provides, among other things, in Article III:

> The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

The ninth paragraph of section 8 of Article I gives Congress the power to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court. Now, the language of the first section of Article III, as I have already read, is that—

> The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.

Therefore it is perfectly clear that the President has no power to constitute courts inferior to the Supreme Court. He has no power to constitute the Supreme Court or any inferior court. It is a legislative power to create an office. It is an Executive power to fill the office.

The bill, if I interpret it correctly, vests in the President of the United States the power to create an office—to create the additional office of judge whenever he thinks the public good requires it. It seems to me very clearly that that is a power which belongs only to Congress. Congress may say, as it did in the case of Maryland, "There shall be an additional judge appointed in Maryland," which is equivalent to saying: "Congress hereby creates the office of an additional district judge in Maryland," and then vests in the President the power to fill the office thus constituted. But this bill undertakes to say that the President of the United States, if he thinks the public good requires it—upon the mere state of his own mind—may, first of all, create an additional office, and then proceed to fill it by the appointment of a particular person. The fact that the two functions may be, so to speak, discharged by the one act, does not alter the situation at all. He declares the necessity for the additional judge, and then appoints him; but when we come to analyze the proposition and separate it into its essential parts, we find that what he has actually done has been to create an office, and then, at the same time, by the same act, to fill it. This bill authorizes him therefore to create at the present time, if he thinks proper to do so, 14 additional offices of circuit and district judges. The Constitution speaks of the position of judge as an office—the office of judge; and when you provide for the appointment of a judge you create the office of judge, and when you appoint him you fill the office.

The same rule obtaining with reference to creating additional judgeships and filing them upon the circuit or in the district will apply to the Supreme Bench. What would the Senator from Georgia say if a bill should be brought in here providing that when in the judgment of the President of the United States the public good required it he could appoint five additional judges upon the Supreme Bench? Would not the Senator think that that was creating additional offices?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the Constitution has entirely separated the Supreme Court from the balance of the judiciary, and that it should be treated in an entirely different way.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There is not any difference between the Supreme Court and these other courts in that respect. The difference is that the Constitution creates the Supreme Court, but the Constitution does not prescribe the number of judges. The Congress has from time to time increased, and I think upon one occasion decreased, the number of judges to sit in the Supreme Court. In other words, Congress has constituted the tribunal. Each judge of the Supreme Court holds an office; and whenever Congress says that there shall be an additional judge upon the Supreme Bench, making the number 10 instead of 9, Congress will have created an additional office. It seems to me very clearly that that power is a legislative power, and that Congress has not any authority to devolve it upon the President of the United States.

My information is that there is one case—I do not care to give the judge's name, or the district which he serves—where the situation really calls for action upon the part of Congress. A judge has long passed the age of 70, and refuses to retire, and he is unable to discharge the duties of his office. Of course, that is a situation which calls for action; but there is not the slightest doubt that if a bill were presented which sought to rectify that situation, providing for an additional judge in that district, Congress would hasten to pass it.

Mr. President, I think I have said all that I care to say at present upon this bill. As the debate develops I may desire to say something further, but for the present I do not care to say anything more.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the report the committee made upon this subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The report submitted by Mr. SMITH of Georgia, of January 5, 1916, is as follows:

[S. Rept. No. 21, 64th Cong., 1st sess.]

ADDITIONAL CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT JUDGES OF THE UNITED STATES IN CERTAIN CASES.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report (to accompany S. 706).

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 706) to amend section 260 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, having considered the same, beg leave to report it back and to recommend that it be passed.

The first recommendation made by Mr. Attorney General McReynolds in his report for 1913 was as follows:

"Judges of United States courts, at the age of 70, after having served 10 years, may retire upon full pay. In the past many judges have availed themselves of this privilege. Some, however, have remained upon the bench long beyond the time when they were capable of adequately discharging their duties. The power of Congress to correct this condition is limited by the provision of the Constitution that judges shall hold their offices during good behavior. I suggest an act providing when any judge of a Federal court below the Supreme Court fails to avail himself of the privilege of retiring now granted by law that the President be required, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint another judge, who shall preside over the affairs of the court and have precedence over the older one. This will insure at all times the presence of a judge sufficiently active to discharge promptly and adequately the duties of the court."

Mr. Attorney General Gregory, in his report for 1914, renewed the recommendation of his predecessor, adopting his exact language.

We had, therefore, at the last session of Congress, the recommendation of Mr. Attorney General McReynolds, now Mr. Justice McReynolds, that judges were remaining upon the bench after they had passed the age of 70 years, and long beyond the time when they were capable of adequately discharging their duties, and in consequence the administration of justice had suffered.

We had, also, his recommendation that the President be required, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint another judge "who shall preside over the affairs of the court and have precedence over the older one in cases where the judge reached the age of 70 after serving 10 years and failed to resign."

We had, also, the express indorsement by Mr. Attorney General Gregory of the views of Mr. Attorney General McReynolds on this subject.

A bill to carry out these recommendations was reported favorably by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate at the last session. Mr. Root, the senior Senator at that time from New York, served upon the subcommittee which reported the bill favorably, and cordially supported the measure.

The report of Mr. Attorney General Gregory for 1915 recommends again this legislation in the following language:

"Judges of United States courts who have attained the age of 70 and have served 10 years may retire upon full pay. In the past many judges have availed themselves of this privilege. Some, however, have remained upon the bench long beyond the time when they were capable of adequately discharging their duties, and in consequence the administration of justice has suffered. The power of Congress to correct this condition is limited by the provision of the Constitution that judges shall hold their offices during good behavior.

"I again renew the suggestion made by my predecessor that Congress pass an act providing that when any judge of a Federal court below the Supreme Court fails to avail himself of the privilege of retiring now granted by law the President be authorized, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint another judge to preside over the affairs of the court and have precedence over the older one. This will insure at all times the presence of a judge sufficiently active to discharge promptly and adequately the duties of the court."

We have, therefore, three recommendations from the Department of Justice and from two different Attorneys General, one of whom is now upon the Supreme Court bench of the United States, recommending this legislation. These recommendations, of course, cover the opinion of the Department of Justice not only that the legislation is needed and is desirable, but that it is constitutional.

The bill which the Judiciary Committee reports favorably follows the recommendations of the Department of Justice, except that instead of requiring the President to appoint an additional judge when a judge of the circuit or district court who has served 10 years reaches 70 years of age it authorizes the President to make such appointments "if in his opinion the public good so requires."

The bill as favorably reported permits the President to make the appointments, but does not require it. There may be cases in which a judge of unusual vigor is capable of performing the work of his circuit or district without injury to his health and without injury to the service, even though he has reached "the days of our years," which, we have been told, are "three score years and ten."

There are now seven positions upon the circuit court bench where judges have served more than 10 years and have passed 70 years of age. There are also seven positions upon the district court bench where the same situation exists.

In a majority of these cases it is probable that the service would be improved and the health of the judges saved by the immediate appointment of the judges authorized by this bill.

Giving an extreme case, there is a circuit court judge now more than 80 years of age who, I am informed, for more than four years has been entirely unable to attend sessions of the circuit court of appeals or do any business, and who has no prospect of ever being able to again perform the work of circuit court judge. For a number of years before he ceased to sit upon the circuit court of appeals he was not capable of efficiently performing the full duties of the office, yet he has failed to resign, and the work of the court has suffered for the lack of a judge.

This bill will in future relieve the circuit and district court bench from the clogging of business by the lack of a judge of sufficient youth to give it proper attention. It will prevent the necessity for resignations, and thus retain the services of judges who have passed 70 to the extent they are able to do judicial work.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The hour of 2 o'clock has practically arrived. So I will not proceed with any remarks at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is so near the hour of 2 that the Chair lays the unfinished business before the Senate, which is Senate bill 3331.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hughes	Norris	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	Husting	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.
Beckham	James	Overman	Smoot
Brandegee	Johnson, Me.	Page	Sterling
Catron	Jones	Phelan	Sutherland
Clapp	Kenyon	Poindexter	Thomas
Clarke, Ark.	La Follette	Ransdell	Tillman
Cummins	Lee, Md.	Saulsbury	Vardaman
du Pont	McCumber	Shafroth	Wadsworth
Fall	McLean	Sheppard	Walsh
Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Sherman	Warren
Gallinger	Myers	Shields	Weeks
Gronna	Nelson	Simmons	Williams

Mr. MYERS. I announce the absence from the Chamber, on official business, of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD].

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. I will allow this notice to stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Fifty-two Senators have responded to their names. There is a quorum present.

AMERICAN ACADEMY OF ARTS AND LETTERS.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask unanimous consent to submit a favorable report from the Committee on the Judiciary. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 1424) incorporating the American Academy of Arts and Letters, to report it favorably with certain minor amendments, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. A similar bill has passed the Senate on three former occasions.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read first.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 3, after the name "William Dean Howells," to strike out "New York" and insert "Maine"; in line 7, to insert a semicolon after "New York";

in line 8, to change the spelling of "Sloan" to "Sloane"; and on page 2, line 18, to change the spelling of "Macmonies" to "Macmonnies," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That William Dean Howells, of Maine; Henry Adams, of the District of Columbia; Theodore Roosevelt, of New York; John Singer Sargent, of Massachusetts; Daniel Chester French, of New York; John Burroughs, of New York; James Ford Rhodes, of Massachusetts; Horatio William Parker, of Connecticut; William Milligan Sloane, of New Jersey; Robert Underwood Johnson, of New York; George Washington Cable, of Massachusetts; Andrew Dickson White, of New York; Henry van Dyke, of New Jersey; William Crary Brownell, of New York; Basil Lanneau Gildersleeve, of Maryland; Woodrow Wilson, of New Jersey; Arthur Twining Hadley, of Connecticut; Henry Cabot Lodge, of Massachusetts; Edwin Howland Blashfield, of New York; William Merritt Chase, of New York; Thomas Hastings, of New York; Hamilton Wright Mabie, of New Jersey; Brander Matthews, of New York; Thomas Nelson Page, of the District of Columbia; Elihu Vedder, of Massachusetts; George Edward Woodberry, of Massachusetts; Kenyon Cox, of New York; George Whitefield Chadwick, of Massachusetts; Abbott Handerson Thayer, of New Hampshire; Henry Mills Alden, of New Jersey; George de Forest Brush, of New Hampshire; William Rutherford Mead, of New York; Bliss Perry, of Massachusetts; Abbott Lawrence Lowell, of Massachusetts; James Whitcomb Riley, of Indiana; Nicholas Murray Butler, of New York; Paul Wayland Bartlett, of New York; Owen Wister, of Pennsylvania; Herbert Adams, of New Hampshire; Augustus Thomas, of New York; Timothy Cole, of New York; Cass Gilbert, of New York; William Roscoe Thayer, of Massachusetts; Robert Grant, of Massachusetts; Frederick Macmonnies, of New York; Julian Alden Weir, of Connecticut; William Gillette, of Connecticut; Paul Elmer More, of New Jersey; George Lockhart Rives, of New York; and their successors, duly chosen, are hereby incorporated, constituted, and declared to be a body corporate of the District of Columbia, by the name of the American Academy of Arts and Letters.

SEC. 2. That the purposes of this corporation are and shall be the furtherance of the interests of literature and the fine arts.

SEC. 3. That the American Academy of Arts and Letters shall consist of not more than 50 regular members, and the said corporation hereby constituted shall have power to make by-laws and rules and regulations; to fill all vacancies created by death, resignation, or otherwise; to provide for the election of foreign, domestic, or honorary associate members, and the division of such members into classes, and to do all other matters needful or usual in such institutions.

SEC. 4. That the American Academy of Arts and Letters shall hold an annual meeting at such place in the United States as may be designated and shall make an annual report to the Congress, to be filed with the Librarian of Congress.

SEC. 5. SEC. 6. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUGHES in the chair). The pending amendment is that offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. NORRIS. I ask that the amendment may be read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] proposes the following amendment, which is now pending:

On page 6, line 12, after the words "Secretary of War," to insert the words "and the Secretary of the Interior," so that if amended it will read:

"(8) That such grantee in the construction, maintenance, and operation of such dam or diversion structure and accessory works may, with the authority of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior, occupy and use, to the extent necessary for the project, any lands of the United States, including the public lands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, inasmuch as I am unable to give my consent to the passage of this bill, I feel justified in giving my reasons for occupying that position regarding it. I shall not attempt to discuss the bill in extenso, because it has already been the subject of considerable debate, and because I had occasion two years ago and more to consider a similar proposition and at considerable length. I refer to what was then known as the Connecticut River Dam bill, which was a bill designed to confer a similar right upon one corporation to that which is here designed as a general proposition, of which all corporations engaged in the business of generating power can avail themselves if desired.

I have been impressed with the title of the pending bill, not because it is unique, Mr. President, but because it is the expression of what is the ostensible purpose only of this proposed legislation. The title is:

A bill to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

I am aware of the fact that the bill is properly entitled, and that the power which is sought to be exercised and delegated under it can be exercised and delegated in no other manner by the National Government than by the operation of what is properly known as the commerce clause of the Constitution.

By a series of decisions, which have crystallized into a fixed principle of law and one that has been fixed for a great many years, the General Government has jurisdiction over all navigable streams for purposes of navigation, and, consequently, is responsible for the development of such streams, which, of course, includes the prevention of obstructions in them which may interfere with navigation, to the end that the main purposes of its jurisdiction can be made effective.

But under that general power the General Government has advanced and extended its jurisdiction over the watercourses of the United States until it is extremely difficult to determine where, if at all, any limitation upon that power exists.

During the past few years, and since the birth of that mighty movement which was developed by the discovery of processes of generating the electric current so that the same could be made commercially available, this power of delegating to others the right to construct power plants for the purposes of developing such current also has taken to itself the absolute power of determining whether a stream called navigable shall or shall not be obstructed by dams.

The time was when the riparian owner might place an obstruction in a stream bordering upon his land, so long as it did not, in the opinion of the national authorities, interfere with navigation. He was permitted to construct what might or might not in time prove to be a nuisance from the standpoint of navigation, but he was at liberty to take his chances, if he so desired, upon that contingency.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] a few days ago directed attention to some conditions in his State where dams were placed across streams not then supposed or assumed to be navigable for the purpose of providing for local requirements, the furnishing of power for a mill or to set in motion such other machinery as might be necessary for neighborhood uses, and those who constructed such dams as he referred to or their posterity have awakened to the fact that after congressional legislation upon the subject has taken place they are not at liberty to make such improvements as the condition of these obstructions imperatively require until and unless a great department of the Government is here invoked and permission for that purpose be obtained.

I was very much impressed, Mr. President, with the condition to which the distinguished Senator referred, not only because it is not a local condition, by any means, but because it serves to emphasize the progress which has been made by the General Government in asserting, through the operation of the commerce clause of the Constitution, jurisdiction over practically all the watercourses of the United States.

I presume that there is more than one cause for this condition. The eagerness with which appropriations have been sought for the improvement of rivers and harbors, the pressing demands that have been made upon Senators and Representatives by their constituencies for appropriations of money to be spent within their midst in the improvement of rivers that may by some possibility become navigable, has had much, and perhaps everything, to do with this extension of governmental authority. But, however that may be, no man living can answer this question: "Where is the line of demarcation in the United States between a navigable and a nonnavigable stream?" Upon which side of the line will this bill be confined if it becomes a law, and to what extent will it be excluded from the tributaries of streams which are concededly navigable?

Some suggestion was made during previous discussions of the measure as to the necessity of a legal definition of a navigable stream, which should be inserted in the bill, if possible, that its terms might be clarified and its operation determined. I think that was a most excellent suggestion, and yet I very much question whether under the commerce clause of the Constitution we have that power. The judicial department has determined time and again in concrete instances this question of navigability, and other tribunals have as well carried the doctrine practically to any stream that is capable of floating a log for commercial purposes.

In the Rio Grande case, reported in One hundred and seventy-fourth United States, the Supreme Court in its decision gave expression to a view which has been the fruitful cause by some of the departments of the application of the doctrine to the headwaters of every stream that is assumed to be navigable in the country.

So I am unable to convince myself, Mr. President, that if this bill becomes a law it will in its application be confined to those States and to those streams to which it is the undoubted purpose of the authors of the bill to confine it, and I greatly fear that it will be found as operative in all or in the great part of its conditions and provisos in the section of the United States where my home is located as in those other States nearer the seaboard whose territory embraces the mighty streams of the continent where abundant water power exists if it can be only utilized for the purposes of man. That, Mr. President, would of itself, in the absence of some clarifying conditions that are now not apparent in the bill, compel me to withhold my assent from its provisions.

Mr. President, I have referred to the fact that the title to the bill refers only to its ostensible purpose, its real purpose being to confer upon citizens and upon corporations the right to obstruct streams by proper dams constructed under the supervision of the War Department for the purpose of generating power and to which the matter of navigation is only an incident.

In other words, the bill proposes that the Government of the United States shall exercise its undoubted power to control navigation for the benefit and in the interest of great enterprises which have no legal connection therewith. The Government says to the individual, "I have the power to control navigation over this stream. I will therefore make an ostensible exercise of that power not for the primary purpose of improving navigation—that is only an incident—but for the primary purpose of creating a force in the stream which I will permit you to utilize provided the contract requirements of the law are complied with."

I contend, Mr. President, that that is a perversion, and I say it with all respect of the great power of the Government to a purpose and to an end that the power does not justify and the use of which was never contemplated by the framers of the Constitution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is it any more so than the bills we pass authorizing a railroad company to build a bridge across a navigable river?

Mr. THOMAS. I think so, Mr. President. In the first place, the Government grants permission to a railroad or other company to throw a bridge across a stream under conditions which will not interfere with navigation. It is not the purpose of the Government to authorize by that act something which is designed for an entirely different purpose.

If the Government of the United States entitles such bills as this "An act * * * to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce"——

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. THOMAS. I shall do so in just a moment. And if it also requires that the constructor of the bridge should enter into certain contracts with reference to the use of the bridge, paying to the Government a compensation for its use, and upon the theory that the bill was designed for the purposes of navigation, there would be a faint analogy between the two, but I think, in the absence of those conditions, that there is no resemblance whatever. I now yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, respecting the inquiry of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], in the case of a railroad company, the construction of a bridge has nothing to do with its use of the waters of the stream, while in this instance the obvious purpose is to gain control of the flow of the water for a purpose not within the jurisdiction of the Government.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator from California has very aptly anticipated what I was about to say. There is also another distinction. The Government of the United States does not pretend, when it grants such a right, to do anything except that which it does. For example, a bill authorizing the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad Co. to throw a bridge across the Mississippi from bank to bank is entitled a bill for that purpose; it comes directly to the point. If this bill were entitled as it ought to be—but it would be a title which perhaps, if adopted, would defeat its purpose and deprive us of jurisdiction—"an act to promote the development of water power in the navigable streams of the United States and to provide for the leasing to others of the current created by the improvement thereof," it would be free from the defect which I am now discussing, but that is not its title.

I deny that this Government has any authority to use any of its great sovereign attributes as a pretext for the accomplishment of something which, without such use, it can not do. It might as well, and it would be equally consistent, use its power to levy taxes, its power to declare war, its power to organize the forces of the United States as the means of accomplishing something which is only incidentally connected with it.

Of course, I do not say, Mr. President, that the position which I have just announced with reference to this measure is one which the courts would hold to be untenable, since they doubtless look at the purpose of the bill as expressed in the title and those provisions which have incidental reference—and which, of course, must be inserted—to the matter of navigation in determining the power of Congress to enact it; but nevertheless it is a patent fact that the purpose of this bill—the real purpose of it—is to authorize others to build certain improvements in navigable streams, to the end that the current in the river caused by the flow of the waters may be given a commercial value, and then selling or disposing of that commercial value upon terms to be enacted by Congress.

Again, I say that if this bill in its practical operation could be confined to streams that are actually navigable, while I could not conscientiously vote for it, I certainly would not offer any serious opposition to it at this time, and particularly in view of the decision of the Supreme Court in the Dunbar case, with which the Senate has been made familiar by previous discussion, and to which I will only refer.

But, Mr. President, I have referred to the difficulty of determining at present what is and what is not a navigable stream. As a matter of fact, most of the provisions contained in this bill for the protection and promotion of navigation are simply words "full of sound and fury, signifying nothing." We have navigable streams in this country, but only a few of them are navigated, and until there can be some correlation—which I think can only be brought about by governmental action—between our great systems of land transportation and our antiquated systems of water transportation, they never will be so used. We must spend, not only as much money as we have heretofore expended for these purposes, but we may multiply the expenditure fourfold, and yet navigation, in the sense of use for commercial purposes, will not be visibly increased, so long as the land and water transportation systems of the country are divorced. That is another reason why I say that this bill is ostensibly for one purpose but really for another purpose.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. With reference to the suggestion made a moment ago by the Senator from Colorado, I desire to say that I was one of the persons who believed that it was possible to define the words "navigable waters" or "navigable streams." I spent a good deal of time in the effort to put into language a definition which was really in my mind. I found it, however, impossible; but I desire to suggest to the Senator from Colorado that, while these terms may not be capable of definition or restriction, it is clear that this bill can be restricted to certain waters or streams; that is to say, it is not necessary for us to apply this bill to every stream over which Congress may have jurisdiction under its authority to regulate commerce among the States; and I am going to suggest now to the Senator, so that he may consider it if he cares to do so at this time, an amendment that I intend to offer to the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. I shall be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. CUMMINS. I, of course, reserve the privilege of changing this amendment before it is finally offered; but if I remain in my present mind, I intend to propose that after the words "navigable waters," in line 2 of page 2, there be inserted the following:

Other than streams, and such streams or parts of streams as are in their ordinary natural condition used in a substantial way for the transportation of persons or property in interstate or foreign commerce; or which, through improvement heretofore or hereafter, have been or shall be made usable in such commerce.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, Mr. President, I shall personally welcome any suggestion, and especially any suggestion from the Senator from Iowa, who has given great study to these matters, which will tend to distinctly limit—no matter what the limitations may be—but which will tend to distinctly limit the operation of this bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Colorado will at once see that the language I have used here will limit the application of this bill and will exclude many streams which are now abstractly or theoretically navigable.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, I think that is so; and because of the suggested amendment I will now refer to a clause of the bill that I intended to speak of later.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I ought to say further, so that the Senator may have my full purpose in view, that I intend to provide by another amendment that with respect to all other streams which are within the jurisdiction of Congress under the Constitution, but which are not navigable in the sense that I have already described, permission shall be given to construct dams without any application to the Secretary of War.

Mr. THOMAS. Personally, I think it would be a good deal better to repeal the law, which now requires such permission wherever an obstruction is proposed to be placed in a stream until it appears that it does interfere with navigation; but there is a section which I shall now read from the print of the three bills in parallel columns, which provides, and I will call this to the attention of the Senator from Iowa—

(f) That such grantee in the construction, maintenance, and operation of such dam or diversion structure and accessory works may, with the authority of the Secretary of War, occupy and use, to the extent necessary for the project, any lands of the United States, including the public lands; and any part of the public lands may, on certification by the Secretary of War that the same is required for navigation purposes, be withdrawn by the President for said purpose as provided in the act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to make withdrawal of public lands in certain cases, approved June 25, 1910."

I presume that, with the possible exception of the Columbia and Colorado Rivers, there are no really navigable rivers in the United States where public lands exist that can be withdrawn under that provision, and, consequently, I think it would be well to consider in connection with the amendment the propriety of another amendment striking that provision out of the bill. It may be that my apprehension regarding it is not well-founded, but I intended before leaving the floor to emphasize the fact that this bill, because of this proviso, seemed to be of universal application, whether so intended or not, under the terms of which, upon a mere certificate of the Secretary of War, such public lands under the withdrawal act of 1910—the operation of which has wrought such havoc in the arid States of the Union—can be brought into operation, and its privileges invoked in the practical operation of this measure should it become a law.

But, Mr. President, there is to my mind another and more fundamental objection to this bill, one which lies at the foundation of this measure and of every similar measure, and that is the assumption by the Government of the United States of property and property rights in the waters themselves in the navigable streams of the country to be used in a commercial way and by the Government in a proprietary capacity through the operation of its sovereign power.

It is only in recent years, Mr. President, that the proposition that the Government of the United States had any ownership or control whatever in the watercourses of the country, except for purposes of navigation, has ever been seriously questioned. The entire gamut of State and Federal decisions, beginning away back in colonial days and running down to within the last quarter of a century, is, without exception, in recognition and enforcement of the doctrine that no such ownership or proprietorship exists. On the contrary, the waters of navigable and other streams, to the extent to which proprietorship may exist in running water and in the beds of the streams themselves, have been vested either in the States or in the riparian proprietors. More recently, however, through legislation, through the expanding construction, if I may use the term, of its right and control over navigation, the Government of the United States now assumes that it can, through the exercise of its jurisdiction for a public purpose, acquire rights of private ownership in property which has long been recognized as existing elsewhere. A corollary of the proposition is that you can not recognize it without also recognizing the right of the Government, through its exercise of one of its sovereign powers, to confiscate the property of others, both of States and of individuals. Now, that is what this bill does. You may disguise it in any phraseology you may choose; you may say nothing about it in your legislation, but so frame the legislation itself as to make it inevitable, and the result is the same. It is a dangerous and most sinister thing, Mr. President, to admit the existence of any such power in the Government of the United States, for, once admitted, it can not be confined to the thing which involves the admission.

This bill contains some evidence of that, for certainly if the Government of the United States owned anything or assumes to own anything up to this time beyond such ownership as the control of navigation confers, I do not think it has been announced; but I find this expression in section 7 of the bill:

And the plant and its appurtenances of the grantee, including real, personal, and mixed property, constituting the same and used for the generation and distribution of power, or for other purposes, shall be subject to taxation under the laws of the State where situated as other similar property within the State, while owned by the grantee.

In other words, this bill assumes to confer upon the States of the Union where these improvements are located the power to tax the structure erected.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. In connection with what the Senator has said, I wish to make a suggestion to him in regard to that clause, in order that he may consider it in his remarks.

Mr. THOMAS. I will be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. SHIELDS. The author of this bill and the committee in passing upon that particular clause—in fact, it was inserted at the present session; it was not in the bill presented at the last session or in the bill originally introduced in this body—did not include it in the bill for the purpose of vesting the States with power to tax property within their borders, but to exclude the idea that such property might be exempt from taxation, because the company might be considered a quasi-Federal agent in developing the navigation of the stream. The purpose of the clause was to make the question clear beyond doubt that the States did have the power. The committee never assumed that they did not; and it was only with a view to preventing an attempt being made to exempt from taxation water-power development campanies, because to some extent such companies might be considered Federal agencies, and therefore exempt from taxation.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have no doubt that the statement of the Senator having charge of the bill with regard to the origin of this clause is correct, but it is precisely through the insertion of such features into legislation that there is based the existence of all of these assumed powers, all of these usurped powers, if I may use the expression.

Now, I contend, Mr. President, with reference to this clause—and, of course, the purpose was an apt one and a proper one—I contend that this clause has no business in this or in any other proposed legislation, unless it is necessary, and I can not reconcile its inclusion in the bill on any theory except that it is a permission on the part of the General Government to the States to tax something which, because of the Government's asserted right of ownership in the current of the stream and as an incident thereto, and as property created under the terms and conditions of this bill, the State might not otherwise have the right to use and concerning which its taxing power might not be exercised.

Should this bill become a law, the next bill which is enacted will probably go a step further, or, perhaps, the construction given by the courts concerning it will take it many steps beyond the purposes which were designed to be effected and accomplished by inserting it in the bill, and it will be regarded as the concession of a right to the States, but for which that right could not be exercised. I want to say, Mr. President, that in my mind it is just as consistent and just as lawful for the Government of the United States to assume to exercise the power of taxation or its sovereign rights of exempting property from State taxation, as it is to assert ownership in the power to be generated by the increased flow of the current consequent upon the improvement of a stream. So that, however this bill may be amended, it is to my mind subject to this fundamental objection.

Many of the great lawyers of this body have been called upon to examine and express their views with regard to it, and, with a few honorable exceptions, the overwhelming current of conclusion is that the powers of the General Government over navigable streams are confined, and ought to be confined, to its control over the same for purposes of navigation.

I do not understand, Mr. President, as was said by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] yesterday, that the courts have gone any further in their recognition of this doctrine than to say that where the Government itself improves the navigability of a stream, a stream that is navigable in fact as well as in law, and in consequence of such improvement an increased flow is created, thereby generating a current that can be used for commercial purposes, it may exercise dominion over it as an incident to the work which it itself has carried on and make such disposition of the surplus as it sees fit to make; and that is further, in my judgment, than they ought to go.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. WORKS. I call the Senators' attention to the clause of the bill commencing at line 1, page 2, and extending down to the word "permit," in line 7. The bill first provides for the construction of dams for the improvement of navigation, which would very clearly be within the power of the Federal Government; but it also provides:

> And for water power or other purposes across, in, or along any of the navigable waters of the United States—

That the Senator has very clearly covered in what he has said already, but I want to call attention to what follows—> and such grantee and such permit shall at all times be subject to the provisions of this act and also subject to such conditions as the Secretary of War shall, in accordance with the provisions of this act, make a part of such permit.

Does the Senator think that the Government of the United States has the right to control the use of water within a State by a permit issued by the Secretary of War?

Mr. THOMAS. If it owns the water, I presume its control over it would be as absolute as that of an individual.

Mr. WORKS. But does the Senator think it owns the water?

Mr. THOMAS. Emphatically no; and I was going to add that, even under those circumstances, I think it is clothing a single individual with altogether too much power over great enterprises and over individuals and companies engaged in them; but I presume that the clause was inserted because it has appeared in bills of similar import in the past.

Now, Mr. President, if it be true that the National Government has such ownership in the waters of navigable streams as would justify the enactment of a bill like this, it is equally true, in my mind, that it may, as any other owner can, refuse to do anything whatever with this valuable property, or it may determine to sell the same outright instead of leasing or contracting for the use of it, or it may establish works of its own for the generation of power; and it may, of course, make disposition of it by entering either into competition with local producers or by monopolizing the market, or, Mr. President, it may even go further and create a market for it by establishing such structures and occupations as are necessary for its commercial consumption. In other words, I am unable to divorce the theory of ownership from any of the attributes of ownership, and, once asserted, every attribute belonging to it necessarily springs or may spring into operation at any time that the owner may determine.

Mr. President, I have occupied more time than I intended in my discussion of that branch of the subject; but there are one or two other features of the bill to which I wish to refer.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question if he will permit me.

Mr. THOMAS. I am perfectly willing to yield for an interruption.

Mr. SHAFROTH. In view of the interesting discussion that we have had from the Senator to-day relative to this matter, is it the opinion of the Senator that the Government can enter into any kind of arrangement, under any kind of law, by which the waters can be utilized for the purpose of generating power?

Mr. THOMAS. I shall have to ask the Senator whether his question is general, or confined to the waters of navigable streams?

Mr. SHAFROTH. The waters of navigable streams.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not think so; and yet I say that with all due respect to some decisions of the Supreme Court which might convey a different conclusion.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Then is it the opinion of the Senator that any kind of a law could be constructed that would utilize the waters of navigable streams for the purpose of generating power?

Mr. THOMAS. Why, I think the State laws are ample for that purpose. They ought to be. If A, B, and C are the riparian owners of land along a stream capable of developing water power, whether navigable or nonnavigable—and, of course, if it is navigable it is subject to the general control of the Government over the matter of navigation—they have the right so to utilize their property as to produce the best results.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Then, as I understand, the Senator asserts that no law of this kind can be enforced by the Government of the United States, or is constitutional under the Constitution of the United States, for the purpose of utilizing the water powers of navigable streams under laws of the United States?

Mr. THOMAS. Why, Mr. President, I will not say that no such law can be enforced, because I think the tendency of the courts now is to uphold practically any power that Congress asserts to be within its jurisdiction; but I believe that such laws are based practically upon usurpation. I have expressed my apprehension that this bill, if enacted, will be applicable as well to nonnavigable as to navigable streams, and therefore it is of great interest to the States of the Rocky Mountain region. I am very much afraid that my distinguished friend the Senator from Iowa will find some difficulty in framing a proviso limiting its operation as he suggested here, although my hopes and my prayers are with him in his most commendable effort.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. Before the Senator passes from the general discussion, I should like to have a clear idea about his view as to what ought to be done. I understand that he feels that this bill ought not to pass. The present law makes it criminal to put a dam in a navigable stream. Will the Senator tell us what he would do in the premises?

Mr. THOMAS. If it were left to me, I would repeal that law.

Mr. WALSH. So that anyone would have the liberty, as he saw fit and as he was authorized by the State, to put a dam across a navigable stream?

Mr. THOMAS. Precisely; just as they did, before the law was passed, for nearly 100 years after the formation of this Government.

Mr. WALSH. Take the Keokuk Dam, for instance. The Senator would be willing, would he, to allow anybody to build a dam across the Mississippi River at Keokuk, as he would be authorized to do so by the State of Iowa?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir. There is a navigable stream; and it is not only navigable, but it is used for commercial purposes and for navigation.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. And I have not denied—at least, I think I have not denied—the controlling power of the Government over streams that are navigable, for purposes of navigation.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, we are all assuming that this bill deals with those streams. The Senator was passing to another consideration. He was passing to the consideration of streams that are not in fact navigable, and probably never will be navigable, and that is why I address myself to him at this time. I should like to ask the Senator to confine his attention now to the streams that are navigated. If we can confine the bill to those streams, will the Senator then say that it ought not to pass?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; emphatically, that it ought not to pass. I say that it ought not to pass because it is based upon an assertion or a claim that is fundamentally wrong.

Mr. WALSH. Will the Senator, then, kindly give us, briefly, his ideas as to what kind of provisions ought to be in a bill that will let us dam that kind of a stream?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana is one of the ablest lawyers in the United States, and, in my humble judgment, the ablest lawyer in this body. He is familiar with the whole line of legislation upon this subject, from the inception of the Government to the present time. We have had laws, and some of them are still upon the statute books, dealing with that subject, passed by the Congress in the exercise of its undoubted right of legislation with regard to navigable streams. I should be perfectly content to go back to that legislation. The difficulty is, however, that under the modern legal acceptation of the term "navigable stream" I do not believe the Senator, with all of his ability, can so legislate as to confine a measure like this to the streams to which he is referring.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to say, if the Senator will permit me, that I feel, as he does and as the Senator from Iowa does, that there should be something in this bill which will limit the scope of its action; and beyond that area I am agreed with the Senator from Colorado that we should leave the thing as the law was before 1890, giving everybody the right, as the State law authorized, to dam the streams; and the Senator will find me helpful in any way I can be in bringing about that result. But, Mr. President, we have now introduced an amendment to this bill by which we cut off those unnavigated and, as a matter of fact, unnavigable streams from those that are navigated and from those over which the right of navigation will probably be extended in the very near future. The question I put to the Senator is whether he would now, taking those portions of the stream—the lower portions of the stream, the navigated portions of the stream—allow those to be dammed ad libitum, or would he pass some law of Congress to allow it?

Mr. THOMAS. Why, certainly not.

Mr. WALSH. What is the Senator's view as to what should be the governing features of a bill of that kind?

Mr. THOMAS. The governing features of a bill of that kind should be the governing features of the statutes controlling the subject up to 1890, as I remember.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that that law gave you the right to construct dams ad libitum until Congress came along and directed you to tear them out.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course; but I do not think the Senator can find a recorded instance of the exercise on the part of the States of the right under the laws of the States of building a dam in a stream that is actually navigable, that is interfered with or obstructed. I do not think so. I am very glad to know that the Senator and I are agreed with reference to a part of the proposition, but I am afraid we are so hopelessly divided as to the rest of it that we will not find many points in common from this on.

Mr. President, the tributaries of streams that are concededly navigable ramify every part of the United States, and particularly the mountain regions. There are no navigable streams in my State, although I have been importuned once or twice to seek appropriations for the purpose of improving them under the river and harbor bill. The great rivers are born in the snows of the mountains, and they are small and turbulent, and the idea of navigability as connected with them is practically absurd; yet I am here to say that under the commerce clause of the Constitution and the legislation of Congress thereunder the War Department assumes jurisdiction over all these streams, whether navigable or not, and exercises the right of determining and passing upon the application of a citizen of my State who may desire to divert the waters of a small tributary of a navigable stream for purposes of agriculture. That is based upon the theory that the power necessarily must extend to the tributaries of navigable streams, lest they be so diverted as to decrease the flow of waters and thus injure navigation.

The then Senator from Ohio, Mr. Burton, last February, went so far as to concede the extent to which the doctrine could be carried when questioned upon the subject by the Senator from Iowa, who asked him whether this jurisdiction might not be logically carried to the ordinary surface waters or run-off from storms that sweep over the country at intervals, and whether, if some honest cottager saw fit to gather a lot of rain water in his cistern for domestic use, that might come within the jurisdiction of the War Department as tending to injure or interfere with the surface flow or the flow of navigable streams; and be conceded that that might be the case. It occurred to me that he might go further, and ask whether the jurisdiction did not and must not extend over the clouds in the heavens, and the dews of the morning upon the surface of the earth, and the fogs that float shoreward from the seas, and the melting snows, as a Senator suggests, from the snow-clad summits of the mountains. In other words, this jurisdiction, if it is properly asserted, can be carried even to the apparently absurd extent to which I have adverted.

In the State which I in part represent here we have had cogent instances of the exercise of this authority, and extreme difficulty, in consequence, in one or two cases—I say "difficulty" because of the complications that necessarily attend the shifting of an application from one department to another here in Washington—in securing the recognition and approval of the right to divert a few inches of water for the purpose of cultivating the ground. That being the case, we are naturally a little bit apprehensive about any bill that is designed to extend the control of the Government over so-called navigable streams. In the present contemplation of the law every running stream is navigable, in that it must be ultimately a tributary to some stream that is capable of navigation, and consequently interference with it may affect the waters of the navigable stream many miles below. So I am apprehensive that if John Smith or John Brown, in the State of New Mexico or Colorado or Arizona, shall determine to divert upon his own land the waters of a stream in which a toy boat could not make any progress, he will be halted and haled down here to Washington and brought before the Secretary of War, who will very solemnly look into the subject, and determine whether and upon what terms the great Government of the United States will permit this citizen to exercise that power.

Mr. President, I admit that that sounds extreme, but "a burnt child dreads the fire," and some of the children of men in these remote regions have been burnt a number of times, if I may use that metaphor in connection with the discussion of a water problem. So we are charged here with the duty—not implied, but expressed by the legislature of our State and by the people of the State—to see to it that these rights which are so essential, more essential in that country than in any other, to existence and to civilization, shall be safeguarded as far as possible.

Of course, I am aware of the fact that a water-power bill has been reported here having reference to the arid States. I do not intend to discuss that measure at present, beyond saying that when it comes to those streams the Government absolutely reverses its policy. Here it proceeds by virtue of its right as a sovereign and asserts a proprietary interest in water. There it proceeds by virtue of its rights as a proprietor of the land, and asserts its sovereign control over the situation whereby the waters of the State are virtually taken from it and turned over to the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. We will discuss that bill when it comes up for discussion. To my mind, it is far more dangerous and sinister in its possible operation in the arid States of the Union than this would be if, after its enactment, it should be held applicable to that section of the country. I feel, therefore, that it demands the most careful and elaborate consideration before it shall be enacted into law by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. President, I am in hearty sympathy with the sincere efforts and purposes of men like my distinguished friend the Senator from Montana, who differs so widely and so absolutely from me upon a question so vital to the interests of his own State and of my State. I wish I could agree with him, because I know he is absolutely convinced that the enactment of some such measure is as essential to the material welfare of our country as the enactment of any bill pending in this body. But I would rather wait, if I must, and get what the people of my Commonwealth are entitled to, than to recognize an existing condition which, if crystallized into law, will very seriously injure, if not undermine, the great principle of local self-government in the great Rocky Mountain States of the Union.

I am in sympathy, also, with the purpose of this bill. It is not only designed to supply a greatly needed want, an element the use of which has become absolutely necessary to our modern civilization, but it is also designed to modify, if not to destroy, the present monopolistic conditions which exist in the generation of hydroelectric current. I am free to say that much, as I object to the underlying principle of this bill; if I thought for a moment that it could accomplish that purpose I at least would not vote against it; but I predict, although I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, that should this bill become effective, instead of diminishing it will increase the power of the so-called water-power monopoly. I say that for a number of reasons—I may be mistaken with reference to their existence or their application—which convince me, at least, that this is a fact.

In the first place, the generation of electric current, so needed and so universally applied, is a business in which competition is impossible. That has been recognized with reference to the telephone. Only a few years ago there were multitudes of independent telephone companies in the country; and they received, as they should have received, the encouragement and patronage of the people as against the wider and more extensive concern whose exactions caused these independent companies to spring into existence. But where are they now? They have yielded to an inevitable law of commercial gravitation, and have long since been merged into the larger concern and become a part of it.

There is not a State in the Union of which I have any knowledge in which monopolistic conditions in the generation of hydroelectric current do not exist at the present time. Why, we had a little controversy over the printing of a report upon the subject, which you, Mr. President [Mr. FLETCHER in the chair], had the honor to present here, and the printing of which was finally ordered, its purpose being to demonstrate both to the mind and to the eye by appropriate diagrams the existence of this enormous monopolistic condition—a demonstration which is just about as necessary as would be a demonstration to prove that two and two make four. It is here; it has been here; it is going to stay here; and every additional water-power plant will sooner or later, legislation to the contrary notwithstanding, take its place within the fold. It is inevitable.

Why, Mr. President, take the investment bankers of the United States, who finance all these great concerns. They have been recently organized. They are to-day as thoroughly organized as an oath-bound secret society. Any great enterprise which requires financing must proceed through the agency of some one or more of their members, and we must remember that their members are those who financed the existing institutions. Do you tell me that they are going to create or permit competition as against institutions which they have already financed and with whose success their own success is bound up? There may be occasional instances of the financing of such structures outside, but the exceptions prove the rule.

Of course, I admit that the amount of current now generated in many parts of the country is insufficient for the public need. There can be no question about that, and to that extent the bill may prove highly beneficial. But the purpose of it, and for which I understand it is being bitterly opposed by some of the most distinguished antimonopolists in the country, will, I fear, fail of ultimate accomplishment.

I hear some one say: "What are you going to do about it?" Well, Mr. President, I have had the conviction for 10 years, and that conviction is growing with every day of my life, that the one thing to do is to recognize the existence of this monopoly and let the States, in their respective jurisdictions, take it over. If they are not big enough to control it, let the Government of the United States do it. I believe that when a monopoly exists and can not be overcome it should be made a public and not a private monopoly. That, to my mind, is the only solution of the problem, and that it is coming I make no doubt. But now, when the public mind is diverted from these great domestic questions and the imagination pictures hostile fleets crossing the stormy seas and landing thousands upon thousands of men on our defenseless shores, we have not any time to consider great matters of internal concern, matters which were living issues in 1912, and but for these unfortunate conditions would be living issues, and ought to be living issues, to-day. They are sidetracked, and we can do nothing with them so long as we are in our present state of national hysteria; but when that subsides and we become again a reasonable people I hope we shall find that these interests have not taken advantage of us in the meantime.

We used to have a celebrated preacher in the city in which I live, the Rev. Myron Reed, who once said that when the whole family goes to the circus the opportunity of the porch climber is at hand. We have all gone to war mentally. Now is the time for the gentlemen who thrive both upon monopolies existing and monopolies to be created to get in their deadly work. I think we will awake some fine morning after this cruel war is over to find that the hen's nest has been pilfered while we have been talking about preparedness. I hope one result will be that it will hasten the day when the people in their organized capacity will take charge and control of these great monopolistic institutions and devote them to the welfare of the common people.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, to every conclusion of the law stated by the Senator on the subject of the development of water power and the ownership of waters and the banks of rivers and the limits upon the jurisdiction of Congress over navigable waters I agree. His propositions are, in my opinion, absolutely sound, and I have so said in this discussion. The trouble with the Senator, if I may be allowed to say so, and I do it most respectfully, is that the propositions he has so ably discussed here have no application to the bill. Its provisions have been carefully drawn to avoid all violations of the rights of riparian proprietors and of the States, and at the same time to recognize the authority of Congress over navigable streams.

It was the opinion of the author of this bill and of the committee that considered it that the Federal Government has no proprietary interest in navigable waters. Its sole power under the commerce clause is that to regulate transportation in them, to prevent the right of way which the public has in such streams from being obstructed, and to improve it when it is necessary to do so. This power is fully recognized and, we believe, safeguarded in the preparation of this bill.

What is the present law on the subject? Previous to 1890 the only consent that was ever asked by a riparian proprietor who desired to improve a stream for the development of water power was that of the State wherein the stream was located. There is to some extent a concurrent jurisdiction of the Federal Government and the State government over navigable waters, but at all times the power of Congress is paramount and the States must yield to that whenever it is exerted.

Previous to 1890 there was no limitation on the rights of riparian proprietors. There was, of course, no common law which governed such matters, and they could only be controlled by Congress through statutes applicable to the subject.

The act of 1890 to some extent limited the rights of riparian proprietors and required the consent of Congress and the Secretary of War in certain cases. The present law on the subject was enacted in 1899. Section 9 of that act is in these words:

That it shall not be lawful to construct or commence the construction of any bridge, dam, dike, or causeway over or in any port, roadstead, haven, harbor, canal, navigable river, or other navigable water of the United States until the consent of Congress to the building of such structures shall have been obtained and until the plans for the same shall have been submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers and by the Secretary of War: Provided, That such structures may be built under authority of the legislature of a State across rivers and other waterways the navigable portions of which lie wholly within the limits of a single State, provided the location and plans thereof are submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers and by the Secretary of War before construction is commenced.

Section 10 of the same act is in these words:

The creation of any obstruction, not affirmatively authorized by Congress, to the navigable capacity of any of the waters of the United States is hereby prohibited.

The violation of this statute is made a high misdemeanor punishable by fine and imprisonment. The riparian proprietor of any navigable stream to-day is subject to fine and imprisonment whenever he erects any structure upon his own property for any purpose whatever unless he first obtains the consent of Congress, although it may not in any way obstruct the navigable channel of the river or interfere in any way with its navigability.

I agree that that is a very drastic statute but Congress has absolute control over such matters. The law is upon the book and we have to submit to it until it is repealed or amended, which is the purpose of the present bill.

I will read from the opinion of Mr. Justice Lurton in the case of the United States against Chandler-Dunbar Co.:

That power of use and control comes from the power to regulate commerce between the States and with foreign nations. It includes navigation and subjects every navigable river to the control of Congress. All means having some positive relation to the end in view which are not forbidden by some other provision of the Constitution are admissible. If, in the judgment of Congress, the use of the bottom of the river is proper for the purpose of placing therein structures in aid of navigation, it is not thereby taking private property for a public use, for the owner's title was in its very nature subject to that use in the interest of public navigation. If its judgment be that structures placed in the river and upon such submerged land are an obstruction or hindrance to the proper use of the river for purposes of navigation, it may require their removal and forbid the use of the bed of the river by the owner in any way which, in its judgment, is injurious to the dominant right of navigation. So also it may permit the construction and maintenance of tunnels under or bridges over the river, and may require the removal of every such structure placed there with or without its license, the element of contract out of the way, which it shall require to be moved or altered as an obstruction to navigation.

In a subsequent part of the opinion the same eminent judge said:

So unfettered is this control of Congress over the navigable streams of the country that its judgment as to whether a construction in or over such a river is or is not an obstacle and a hindrance to navigation is conclusive. Such judgment and determination is the exercise of legislative power in respect of a subject wholly within its control.

Mr. President, that is only a restatement of what has many times before been decided by the Supreme Court in regard to the power of Congress over such streams. Previous to the act of 1899 the riparian proprietor had a right to erect a structure, and if it was an obstruction to navigation Congress had a right to have it removed, but now the law requires him first to demonstrate to Congress that it is not an obstruction and get a permit before he can build it.

In 1906 an act was passed allowing dams to be constructed under certain conditions, but that conditions were so harsh and prohibitory that Congress was of the opinion it ought to be repealed, and it was repealed by implication, by an act approved June 23, 1910. That act was more drastic and prohibitory than the former one and absolutely precluded further improvement in navigable rivers for water-power development. This is now conceded by everyone, by the Secretary of the Interior, by the Secretary of War, and perhaps everyone who has studied the question.

This bill, by its caption, provides for the amendment of the acts of 1906 and 1910, which were passed expressly for the purpose of allowing dams to be built to develop water power. The caption is as follows:

To amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

It is not misleading, but sets forth both subjects of the legislation—improvement of navigation and development of water power in navigable rivers.

The interest of the General Government in navigation and that of the riparian proprietor are equally protected by the provisions of the bill. They provide for the improvement of navigation in the streams and, at the same time, for utilizing the water power which is developed by such improvements. It is fortunate that the two interests are consistent and can be carried along together without prejudice to either one.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Where does the Senator find a justification under his idea of the law and mine for making any charge by reason of the use of the waters which confessedly belong to the States? When as a part of the navigation the Federal Government does what it ought to do in furtherance of navigation, it loses in my contemplation all possible right to everything else except the navigation. How does the Senator justify it, even if the Government builds a dam and the power can be generated without cost to the Government, that the State should not have the right to tax and the State should not have the right to enjoy the property which it unquestionably owns? In other words, where does the Senator find a justification for a Federal toll on State property?

Mr. SHIELDS. This bill contains no provision for any charge for the use of water unless it is the requirement that the grantee in erecting his dam shall build therein a lock and all other facilities for navigation required in such streams, according to the judgment of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers. That is a very necessary and proper provision of the Government—no improvement should be made that will obstruct navigation.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

Mr. SHIELDS. I will get to the Senator's question in a moment. If the Government is not able at this time to improve these rivers and private capital is willing to do it and at the same time protect the interests of the public in the dam it builds by providing all the facilities for navigation that are required, I can see no reasonable objection to it nor do I see in that any yielding of either the sovereign rights of the States or the rights of the individual proprietors.

In the provisions of the bill providing for the construction of dams with private capital there is no provision for the payment of any tolls, rate, or charges whatever to the Federal Government.

Under the tenth section, answering the Senator's question fully, it is provided that where the United States has constructed a dam whereby water power is created in excess of the necessities of the Government in operating the dam and other facilities for navigation it may sell or lease that power. Whether the Government has that power is no longer an open question. It was the direct question involved in the case of the United State against Dunbar-Chandler Co., reported in Two hundred and twenty-ninth United States, from which I just read. The statute there provided for the condemnation of the bed and banks of the river for navigation purposes; not for the mere easement in them, but for the fee in the property. A subsequent section provided that the United States might lease or sell surplus water. That provision was attacked upon the ground stated by the Senator. Mr. Justice Lurton, speaking for the court, held that the Government might dispose of its surplus power, and evidently, while he does not say so, because the Government built the dam with its money, upon its own property, and was to all intents and purposes a riparian proprietor and had the right to dispose of its property as an individual.

Mr. Justice Lurton emphasizes that the statute authorized the condemnation of the property and acquisition of the absolute fee in it primarily for navigation purposes, and that the authority to sell the water power created was only incidental. It is similar, as was illustrated here by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] yesterday, to the Federal Government disposing of out-of-date guns and other military stores or to any increase or increment of public property. It may dispose of the timber upon its public lands, although it may not deal in timber. But, after all, the basis of that decision is that the United States owns the property by condemnation of the rights of the riparian owner, and therefore that case really is not in conflict with the general principle that has been asserted here on the floor again and again, and last repeated by the Senator from Colorado, that the United States has no proprietary interest in the waters of navigable streams and no right to sell them. I do not believe that the United States has any right to build a dam or construct a power plant for the sale of power. It has no right to engage in commerce in that way.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. SHIELDS. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. For information I should like to ask the Senator whether any governmental toll or impost or duty or obligation is laid on any of the waters of a State in this bill, except in the cases which he differentiates in the decision of Judge Lurton from which he has just quoted.

Mr. SHIELDS. None whatever.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. In all cases, except where the Government itself owns the bank and property and itself builds the dam, is any charge by the Federal Government allowed under this bill?

Mr. SHIELDS. There is no charge whatever except where the Government is the riparian proprietor.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If we could have gone further——

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to say to the Senator perhaps he was out of the Chamber at the time when the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] offered an amendment in order to impose a charge and the Senate rejected it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I remember it.

Mr. SHIELDS. As a matter of course, if such a charge was in the bill, there would have been no effort to amend it so as to impose it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If I had been here I would have voted against that amendment. I should like the bill better and it would get much heartier support from me if even in cases where the Government erected a dam for navigation purposes the Government would be satisfied to leave the power to be developed subject to the taxation and control of the State rather than of the Federal Government. I apprehend this is not the furthest step the Government will take when it commences the imposition of taxes.

Mr. SHIELDS. That question seems to be precluded by the Chandler-Dunbar Co. case, as it is there settled that the Government has the right to sell the excess of power in an improvement created for navigation purposes, and therefore this bill provided for sales and leases in such cases.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Has the Senator the Dunbar case before him?

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes; I will hand it to the Senator.

A careful examination of the provisions of the bill will show that save under section 10, which we have just been discussing, applying solely to dams constructed by the United States and where it has a property interest, no Federal officer is given any authority and the United States is given no interest whatever in the improvement except for the purposes of navigation. The locks are required to be built in order to furnish the necessary navigation facilities in every structure where it is deemed necessary by the Secretary of War. The Secretary of War is given a general supervision over the locks and dams in order that he may see that they do not obstruct navigation, but there is no further control by him or the United States. So there is in the bill absolutely not a single provision that conflicts with the views of the law expressed by the Senator from Colorado.

I do not agree with the Senator from Colorado in his definition of "navigable streams." I wish to read from the case of the United States versus Rio Grande Irrigation Co., in One hundred and seventy-second United States, upon that subject:

> The mere fact that logs, poles, and rafts are floated down a stream occasionally and in times of high water does not make it a navigable river. It was said in The Montello (20 Wall., 430, 439) "that those rivers must be regarded as public navigable rivers in law which are navigable in fact. And they are navigable in fact when they are used, or are susceptible of being used, in their ordinary condition as highways for commerce, over which trade and travel are or may be conducted in the customary modes of trade and travel on water."

And again (p. 442):

> It is not, however, as Chief Justice Shaw said, in 21 Pickering, 344, every small creek in which a fishing skiff or gunning canoe can be made to float at high water which is deemed navigable, but in order to give it the character of a navigable stream it must be generally and commonly useful to some purpose of trade or agriculture.

The bill is only intended to apply to navigable waters, and it is expressed upon its face. The definition of "navigable waters" that I have read is about as clear a one as I know of in the books, and covers the rivers that this bill is intended to apply.

Mr. CATRON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SHIELDS. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CATRON. The Senator states that his bill provides for navigable waters. Is there any difference between navigable waters and navigable streams, in the Senator's judgment; and how much of the stream may be navigable? For instance, take the Rio Grande, which runs through Colorado, New Mexico, and along the border of Texas about 1,900 miles, which is navigable for only about 50 miles for very light draft vessels from its mouth up—how about the remainder of that river? Would it be subject to the provisions of the Senator's bill?

Mr. SHIELDS. Whether or not a river is navigable is, as stated in other parts of the opinion which I have read, largely a question of fact. Of course I could give no opinion upon the navigable character of any river unless I fully understood all the facts in relation to it; but there is no difference between "navigable waters" and "navigable streams," except the term "navigable waters," of course, includes bays and estuaries of the sea. The terms, however, have been used interchangeably in this discussion. In speaking of "navigable waters," of course I mean navigable rivers. There is no water power in gulfs and bays.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I think the question of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] went concretely to this kind of a proposition: The Rio Grande River, as it is termed, rises, as the Senator says, in Colorado, probably flows 250 or 300 miles through that State, and then probably——

Mr. CATRON. It runs 500 miles in New Mexico.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It runs 500 miles in New Mexico, and then on the border between Mexico and the United States probably six or seven hundred miles.

Mr. CATRON. Nearly 1,000 miles.

Mr. SHAFROTH. In the total the river is 1,900 miles long, as the Senator from New Jersey says. The Senator wanted to know whether under this bill, when there are only 50 miles of navigable water, it would come within the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War to determine whether or not a power plant could be erected, say, in the State of New Mexico, which is 500 or 600 miles from the navigable portion of that stream. In other words, if a person were to apply for permission to erect a dam in the State of New Mexico, 600 or 700 miles from the point where this stream becomes navigable, the question which, it seems to me, would be asked is whether or not the Secretary of War under this bill would have any jurisdiction or power whatever to pass upon either the plans or with relation to the construction of that improvement.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will have to say again that would depend on whether or not it was a navigable stream in fact. If it is, it would come within the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War; but if not, it would not come within his jurisdiction under this bill.

Mr. CATRON. What I want to get at is whether that river is considered navigable 700 or 800 miles above the point where anything can be carried over it in a barge or anything else.

Mr. SHIELDS. In my opinion upon those facts it is not a navigable river. What the Secretary of War might say, of course, I can not foretell, but under the authority which I have just read, that would not be a navigable stream.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator from Tennessee refer to the Dunbar case?

Mr. SHIELDS. No; I refer to the case of the United States against the Rio Grande Irrigation Co.

Mr. CATRON. That was a New Mexico case.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, we are in the same situation in relation to the Arkansas River, to which I will call the attention of the Senator from Colorado. The Arkansas River has been held to be navigable throughout Kansas, yet in many parts of the river there never has been even a rowboat on it. I should like to know whether the bill which is being supported by the Senator from Tennessee would apply to a stream of that character?

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I would hardly undertake to determine, without a very great deal more information as to the nature of these rivers, whether they are navigable or not; but one thing is suggested to me by the question of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON]. I think that the Arkansas River was involved in the case of Arkansas against Kansas; and it was very much such a river as has been described by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON]. It was conceded by the Government that it was not navigable, and the Government only intervened there asserting the right to use the water there for irrigation purposes.

Mr. THOMPSON. The courts have held, though, that the river was navigable.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] will pardon me, I do not think that the Government expressly conceded that the river was nonnavigable. It did not attempt to intervene upon that ground, but upon the ground that it was the owner of public lands which this stream and its tributaries traversed.

Mr. SHIELDS. My recollection is that the opinion contains the statement that there was an express concession that it was not a navigable river. Therefore that point was conceded, and it was excluded.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Tennessee may be right.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to suggest to the Senator that, while I do not know what the War Department would hold on the question, I do know that if it were a case in which the Secretary of the Interior had to decide, there would be no question that he would hold that the Government had absolute authority over the stream. Why, Mr. President, the Secretary of the Interior has held that a little stream in the State of Utah that happens to run into the Colorado River, I can not tell how many miles away—and, by the way, for eight months in the year the stream is as dry as is this floor—is absolutely controlled by him because of the fact that there are a few drops of water in it during a few months in the year that go ultimately, perhaps, into the Colorado River.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And no boat has sailed on the Colorado River for the last four or five years.

Mr. SMOOT. There is not a boat in the Colorado River, into which this little stream empties, for I do not know how many hundreds of miles.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I have not examined the question fully, but I do not believe that the judgment or determination of the Secretary of War or of the Secretary of the Interior, where they have jurisdiction of such matters, would be conclusive, and I believe that the property owners would have ample protection in the courts.

Mr. CATRON. Mr. President——

Mr. SHIELDS. I will yield to the Senator in a moment. If I were called upon to determine the question, I would not agree to what it has been stated the Secretary of the Interior might hold, and I know of no court that has ever sustained such a proposition as that. I would fully concur with the language of the case from which I have read that—

> Those rivers must be regarded as public navigable rivers in law which are navigable in fact. And they are navigable in fact when they are used or are suceptible of being used in their ordinary condition as highways for commerce, over which trade and travel are or may be conducted in the customary modes of trade and travel on water.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I want to call his attention to the decision in the Rio Grande case, where the court asserts that it has such jurisdiction or authority over the tributaries of navigable streams as will enable them to see to it that the waters are not used so as to diminish or otherwise interfere with the waters of the navigable part of the stream or to injure its uses for purposes of navigation. It is upon that statement in that case that the jurisdiction of the Interior Department, to which the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has referred, is founded.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I am perfectly aware of that holding; in fact, I was reading from the Rio Grande case, and am familiar with the result of that decision; but that does not affect the definition of a "navigable stream." It has been insisted by the Secretary of War that, under the commerce clause, Congress has jurisdiction to provide for reforesting the mountains in order to supply waters to streams and make them navigable; but no one would say the mountains were navigable. The provisions of this bill relate to navigable streams and not to feeders of navigable streams, and the decision in the Rio Grande case upon that question has no application to this bill.

Mr. CATRON. That decision proceeded on the theory that the waters which were navigable were subject to the provisions of the law in controversy. The pending bill does not say anything about the difference between the waters which can not be navigated in the same stream and those which can be navigated. Does not the Senator think that there ought to be a provision in this bill defining the portion of the stream that is navigable? If the entire stream from its head to its mouth is to be considered navigable under the bill and not subject to be interfered with, possibly it would prevent the diversion of water for an irrigation ditch or for some other purpose, which might slightly interfere with navigation below.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have no objection to a definition of what is a navigable stream, but I would not agree to an amendment to this bill which would apply only to waters that are navigable for commerce. The act of 1899 prohibits the erection of structures in all navigable streams, and we know that applies to some streams that are not open to continuous commerce. We want this act to apply to every stream that is covered by the present restrictions of the law and to open them all for improvement.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President——

Mr. SHIELDS. I will yield in a moment. This is a question of fact that is applicable to every stream, and I think we shall find very great difficulty in providing a definition; in the end, the question of navigability or nonnavigability will have to be left to the courts, and that question will come up under the amendment that has already been offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, the inquiry I wish to address to the Senator is this: Where a State court, for instance, has held that a river is navigable, as the highest court in Kansas has held that the Arkansas River is navigable—although it is impossible in many places even to use a rowboat on it, and it never has been at any time used for commerce anywhere in the State—would this bill apply to a stream of that character?

Mr. SHIELDS. I could not say; I do not know what the statutes of Kansas are upon the subject. There are some States that provide that any creek that will float logs down it shall be considered a public highway and navigable; but whether they are navigable in the sense of the commerce clause of the Constitution is an entirely different question.

Mr. THOMPSON. That is the sense in which the court in Kansas has held the Arkansas River navigable, and there is no special statute on the subject.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator another question; and that is, whether the bill gives any jurisdiction to the War Department concerning the flow of the water above where a dam is to be erected? In other words, does it relate solely and purely to the dam in its construction and the power that may be generated there, or is there contained in the bill any reference to the extension of jurisdiction over the tributaries of a stream which may add to the supply of water for the purpose of generating electricity in the main stream?

Mr. SHIELDS. The only provision which in any way relates to that subject is the one to be found in section 3, I think, which requires the company to pay for the benefit of any headwater improvement by the United States, so far as that improvement increases the flow of water over its dam, or, in other words, so far as the company gets a direct benefit from the improvement. There is no provision that the United States may make headwater improvements, but simply a provision making the development company subject to a contribution for such improvements. I believe pretty much all the legislation on the subject has contained such a provision, special acts as well as the provisions of general dam laws. That is the only provision, I think, that relates in anyway to the Senator's inquiry, except that the Secretary of War is given the power to make certain rules affecting navigation in pools created by dams.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will say to the Senator that, of course, the State of Colorado being of a high elevation, we have no navigable streams in that State, and we would be very much opposed to any bill that would place under the control of the Secretary of War or of any other department of the Government jurisdiction over the streams of the State, but what I was inquiring was whether this bill permits the Secretary of War or any other Secretary to exercise control or power over a stream that goes to make up a navigable river?

Mr. SHIELDS. There is no such authority conferred by any provision of this bill, and I would not vote for it if it contained such a provision.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I should like to interrupt him for a moment to say that, in regard to the Kansas-Colorado decision, the Senator is correct in his recollection of the position of the Government. I read from page 86:

> But the Government makes no such contention. On the contrary, it distinctly asserts that the Arkansas River is not now and never was practically navigable beyond Fort Gibson, in the Indian Territory, and nowhere claims that any appropriation of the waters by Kansas or Colorado affects its navigability.

But on page 117, referring to the decree, the decision says:

> The decree which, therefore, will be entered will be one dismissing the petition of the intervenor without prejudice to the rights of the United States to take such action as it shall deem necessary to preserve or improve the navigability of the Arkansas River.

It was my recollection of the last sentence which confused me with reference to the real admission of the Government to which the Senator referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I have not been apprised by the Senator in charge of the bill that the amendment offered by me is acceptable to him, and I deem it a duty to present to the Senate the considerations which seem to me to make the insertion of the amendment absolutely imperative. I venture to assert that there is no Senator on the floor familiar with the laws affecting the disposition of the public lands who would feel that it would be either wise or safe to provide for the disposition of those lands or for the granting of easements in those lands through any other department of the Government than the Department of the Interior. I can conceive of no reason why the Secretary of War should be authorized, as he is by this bill, to grant an easement in certain public lands.

This, Mr. President, is a consideration altogether apart from the main feature of the bill; that is to say, the construction of a dam within a navigable stream, which would be an obstruction to the navigation of that stream. The determination of that question and everything immediately incidental thereto is very properly reposed in the Secretary of War. His office has charge of all works of improvement on either the rivers or the harbors of this country. It is equipped with a special Corps of Engineers, selected from a branch of the military forces of the United States, the members of which have brought credit to themselves and renown to the Nation whose servants they are.

That part is all right; but, Mr. President, the bill contemplates that by the construction of such an obstruction in the stream, water would be backed up and overflow public lands. If it overflows private lands, the permittee must either acquire the right by negotiation and contract with the private owner of those lands, or he must proceed by condemnation to acquire from the private owner the right to occupy and flood those lands, but if, in the same process, it covers public lands of the United States the negotiations ought to be with that officer of the United States who is charged under the law with the disposition of the public lands.

Why, Mr. President, this bill can not be administered as it is written here. The Secretary of War is authorized to grant a right to occupy the public lands that are thus to be flooded by the water being backed upon them. Speaking with the distinguished Senator who has charge of the bill, and whose ability as a lawyer as well as a legislator everyone is glad to recognize, he confided to me that it was in the mind of those who framed the bill that in the State of Alabama, for instance, or in some of the adjacent States, there would be found possibly some small, inconsequential, fractional tracts of land which, in the course of time, were lost sight of and were never conveyed away by the Government of the United States; and it was intended that this provision should be made applicable to those lands. But, Mr. President, I trust I have given the Senate information that this bill has a country-wide scope—a nation-wide scope. It affects the vast territory drained, for instance, by the Columbia and Sacramento Rivers, and I may say here that one-third of all the power which the United States is capable of developing, it is said, can be developed along the courses of those two streams.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question as a matter of information?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I imagine the Senator and I are both pretty well acquainted with those rivers. Can he conceive of any place on the Sacramento River where the generation of water power would result in the overflow of any public lands of such value as to make it necessary for the engineers under the Secretary of War to call for the interposition of another arm of the Government to protect the rights of the United States in those lands? I can conceive of no place where a pure water-power development in the Sacramento—and I know the Sacramento better than the Columbia—could overflow any land of any value at all, for the power of that river is in the mountains, and as soon as it strikes the valley it becomes a slow stream, running on the level, and wandering somewhat in the sands, as our lower southern rivers do.

Mr. WALSH. Yes, I must say, Mr. President, that I am not aware that the damming of the Sacramento River at any point below the point at which it is navigable would so back up the water as to overflow any public lands. I should not be at all surprised, however, if that were the case in the Columbia River, up and down which I have very often traveled.

But we need not go there; we need not go outside of my own State. I advised the Senate the other day that the Kootenai River is actually navigated, that boats are plying between Jennings and points in British territory, and the damming of that stream will unquestionably back up waters that will overflow public lands.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. I think there is a good deal of force in what the Senator is contending for; and so I venture to ask whether, his premises being correct, it would not be expedient also to enlarge the proviso so as to include the Secretary of Agriculture, since the submersion of public lands might include some part of a forest reserve?

Mr. WALSH. I should say not, Mr. President, for the reason that the disposition of the public lands is not reposed in the Secretary of Agriculture at all. The Secretary of Agriculture has charge of the administration of the laws in relation to the forests; but when it comes to the disposition of any land, even within forest reserves, the law does not permit the Secretary of Agriculture to do anything of the kind. That part of the administration of the law is intrusted to the Secretary of the Interior; and for perfectly obvious reasons, which, if the Senator from Tennessee will attend, I think I can make quite clear and persuasive to him.

In the first place, the Secretary of War does not know and has not any means of knowing whether a particular tract of land is or is not public land. There is nothing in his office which will disclose the fact. If he knows anything at all about it, he must get that information from another department—the Department of the Interior. That department, as everybody understands, keeps on file carefully prepared maps and plats, on the face of which appear notations which will disclose just exactly what lands have been granted away by the United States and what lands are still retained by it. Then, when it is proposed to flood a certain tract of land, the Secretary of the Interior and his subordinates turn to the plats in his office and determine from the face of those plats whether or not it belongs to the Government of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, how long does the Senator think it would take him to inform the Secretary of War of that fact? Not over 15 or 20 minutes, would it, as to any particular tract of land?

Mr. WALSH. That is altogether beside the question.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I think not. The Senator is putting it on the ground that the Secretary of the Interior knows, and on that ground only; so I thought it was relevant to suggest that another department of the Government which had charge of the navigation and the handling of the water would not have to bandy it back and forth between the different departments, and have us in such a condition as we are now before several of our committees, about the oil lands, for instance.

If it was going to be a question of the use of the waters of navigable streams or nonnavigable streams, I thought it might be left to the Secretary of War wherever that Secretary had jurisdiction; and if there was any question of public land, it seemed to me that it was much easier for the Secretary of War to ascertain the value of those lands than to come back and submit the matter to the Secretary of the Interior for final adjustment, and then, on his finding, for the Secretary of War to act again. I thought it would simplify matters; and it was the purpose of my question to call to the Senator's attention how easy it would be for the Secretary having charge of the matter to get the information that the other department had without bandying the applicant back and forth between the two Secretaries. That was the purpose of my question.

Mr. WALSH. The suggestion made by the Senator does not meet the requirements at all. Of course, the Secretary of War could get that information. When he got it, what would he do? And how would the records of the Office of the Secretary of the Interior thereafter show that any such land had been appropriated? The disposition of the public lands is in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior, who is authorized by law to handle these things. Why should you allow anybody else to come in and endeavor to dispose of them?

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. Just a moment. Moreover, when that is done the Secretary of War has no power at all to make, and no means of making, a public record of the fact that would guide the officers of the Government in a subsequent attempt to dispose of the land.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Montana what is the present process of obtaining flowage rights on the public lands where it is proposed to improve rivers for navigation purposes?

Mr. WALSH. The statute provides that if you desire at any time to flow public lands, you shall file with the Secretary of the Interior a map and plat of your reservoir.

Mr. SHIELDS. I am not speaking of private improvements. My question was as to the process of obtaining flowage rights where, under the direction of the Secretary of War, a navigable river through public lands is being improved that requires the flowage of public lands.

Mr. WALSH. Does the Senator mean where it is being done by the Government?

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes; under the direction of the Secretary of War. Of course, there is no other case in which the Secretary of War controls, except for navigation purposes. What is the process then? Is there any conflict of jurisdiction between the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. WALSH. Not the least bit.

Mr. SHIELDS. There is no embarrassment upon the Secretary of War?

Mr. WALSH. No; the Secretary of the Interior does it.

Mr. SHIELDS. How? Does the Secretary of War apply to him for permission to flow the land?

Mr. WALSH. He does not apply for permission; but the President, under the general power that he has to reserve lands generally, reserves a certain area for this particular purpose, and the Secretary of the Interior makes the reservation accordingly.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have been unable to find any legislation that confers such authority on the Secretary of the Interior. I have examined that question since the Senator introduced this amendment to see what was the procedure where an improvement of a navigable river was made in public lands, and I can find no statute that gives the Secretary of the Interior any power to restrict the Secretary of War in making such an improvement.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator a question. Did he find any law that gave any officer of the Government except the Secretary of the Interior power to dispose of any of the public lands?

Mr. SHIELDS. There is the general authority of the Secretary of War in these matters.

Mr. WALSH. In what regard?

Mr. SHIELDS. Why, in directing the improvement.

Mr. WALSH. Directing the improvement?

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes. When Congress makes an appropriation to improve a river the dams are built under the direction and control of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers. I know of no authority for the Secretary of the Interior to control the appropriation of land for navigation purposes.

Mr. WALSH. Why, Mr. President, it is just simply because the Senator is not as familiar as some of the rest of us are with the disposition of the public lands. The operation is just exactly the same. Congress authorizes the making of a certain improvement in a certain river. In order to do that the reservoir will overflow public lands. Congress, by the very act of authorizing the improvement, must be deemed to have authorized the overflowing of those lands; and it is just exactly the same thing as if they authorized a private individual to overflow the lands. The Secretary of War would file with the Secretary of the Interior a map or plat indicating the lines of flowage, and the Secretary of the Interior would note upon his maps and plats the fact that that land was reserved by act of Congress for that purpose.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have been unable to find any statute providing for such procedure. Suppose the Secretary of the Interior refused to grant the right?

Mr. WALSH. He could not refuse to grant it, because the Congress, by authorizing the improvement, has authorized the officers of the Government to overflow that land. But the point I am making, which the Senator does not seem to understand, is that it is necessary for the Secretary of the Interior to be advised of that fact in order that he may make the proper notations upon his records, pursuant to the act of Congress.

Mr. SHIELDS. Oh, Mr. President, we do not intend to keep it a secret from the Secretary of the Interior. Now, the Senator says that the act of Congress authorizes the Secretary of War to overflow those lands for the purpose of making improvements for navigation purposes. The provisions of this bill authorize him to do so.

Mr. WALSH. They authorize a private person to do it. They authorize a private person to create a reservoir.

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes; under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. WALSH. There are laws now which authorize a private person to create a reservoir by flooding public lands. How is it done? The private person thus desiring to flood public lands is required, under the law, to file with the Secretary of the Interior a map or plat, to be approved by him, which dedicates those lands to that particular purpose; and this act is just exactly the same.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not care to interrupt the Senator further; but there is a very great difference between laws authorizing private persons and laws authorizing the chief of a department of the Government to do a thing, with the consent of the President. But I will answer the Senator after he has completed his remarks.

Mr. WALSH. It is quite obvious that the Senator has steeled his mind against any suggestion coming from me, so I content myself with leaving the matter. I submit the amendment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I want to say just a word with relation to this matter.

We have difficulties now even in the construction of little reservoirs. For instance, in the mountains of my State it seems that under the rules and regulations that are prescribed, in order to get a little reservoir, which probably will hold only a few million gallons, it is necessary now not only to go to the Secretary of the Interior, but the application has to go through the Forestry Department where the land is in a forest reserve; it has to be referred to the Secretary of Agriculture; and not only that, but in streams that border upon Mexico it is necessary also to have the Secretary of State pass upon the matter; and, in addition to that, the Secretary of War comes in to see whether or not a navigable stream is injured. In order to get just a little reservoir approved all around, the obstructions now are such that you have to go to four departments where the land is in a forest reserve, and to the Geological Survey also, as is suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

It seems to me that we will simply complicate matters if we adopt this amendment. Here is a bill which is intended to apply to navigable streams. Nine-tenth of these works—yes; ninety-nine one-hundredths of them—will be constructed where not a single piece of public land is touched. Is it possible that we are to require the head of an entirely different department to join in passing upon these matters simply because in one instance out of one hundred or one thousand some part of the works may touch public lands?

It seems to me, Mr. President, that this amendment simply complicates and prevents the expeditious approval of sites for reservoirs or power plants; and therefore I think the amendment ought not to be adopted.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, with reference to the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], the doctrine which he has invoked here as to the power of the Secretary of the Interior has not been entirely sustained, I think. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the Rio Grande Dam & Irrigation Co. case, passed upon a state of facts such as these:

The claimants, the Rio Grande Dam & Irrigation Co., had secured from the Secretary of the Interior one of the old Powell reservoir sites at Engle or Elephant Butte, on the Rio Grande, in New Mexico. They had complied with all the laws with reference to such matters as filing their maps, plans, and profiles, and having them approved by the Secretary of the Interior. The War Department brought suit against the Rio Grande Dam & Irrigation Co., or at least had the suit brought upon their complaint by the Department of Justice. The War Department interfered, of course, upon the ground that the Rio Grande was at some point navigable. To get into court they asserted in their bill of complaint that the Rio Grande was navigable at the point where the Rio Grande Dam & Irrigation Co. proposed to erect their structure—that is, in New Mexico. The court of New Mexico took judicial cognizance of the fact that the Rio Grande was not a navigable stream at that place. The Supreme Court of the United States sustained the Supreme Court of New Mexico, which had sustained the trial court, upon that proposition, that it was within the province of the court to take judicial cognizance of the fact that the stream at that point was not navigable; but it sustained the jurisdiction of the War Department to interfere in a grant already made by the Secretary of the Interior on a nonnavigable stream, upon the theory that the facts might show that the contemplated structure might interfere with the navigable capacity of that stream at some point where it was navigable 1,500 miles below the proposed construction.

This was entirely upon public lands.

So the doctrine that the Interior Department only would have jurisdiction has not been sustained by the Supreme Court. The contrary has been sustained; that is, as I say, that where a structure was proposed to be erected entirely upon public lands, upon a nonnavigable stream, not navigable, admittedly, for 1,500 miles from that point, yet the War Department could have an injunction sustained upon their complaint, upon the theory that the evidence in the case might disclose the fact that such contemplated construction—to use the terms of the Supreme Court, used by them for the first time—might interfere, not with the navigability, but with the navigable capacity, of the stream below.

I thought that decision went to a great length; but, nevertheless, it stands, and was reiterated in the second trial of the case. So that the Supreme Court, inferentially at any rate, has divided the jurisdiction as to public lands in these matters. In other words, it has sustained the proposition that the War Department had jurisdiction, and in its final decision it has practically wiped out the grant made by the Interior Department.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, this is an important provision of this bill, and the amendment proposed would very seriously affect it. It would make this provision unworkable and impracticable. It would be a departure from the jurisdictions of the Department of War and that of the Interior, which have prevailed for many years. I do not think the question has been fully understood, and will not be without reading the provision. I am going to read it:

That such grantee in the construction, maintenance, and operation of such dam or diversion structure and accessory works may, with the authority of the Secretary of War, occupy and use, to the extent necessary for the project, any lands of the United States, including the public lands; and any part of the public lands may, on certification by the Secretary of War that the same is required for navigation purposes, be withdrawn by the President for said purpose as provided in the act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to make withdrawal of public lands in certain cases, approved June 25, 1910"; and for any land of the United States so used and occupied the grantee shall pay to the United States such reasonable charges—

And so forth.

Mr. President, the reading of this provision shows that it relates to a subject purely and solely under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War, and that such lands will not be used, except where required for the purpose of improving the navigation of the river. It only applies where it is necessary for the dam and other appurtenant structures. No power is given under this section to use the lands for the building of power houses or the construction of transmission lines. The only power vested here to use the public lands is wherever the Secretary of War certifies to the President that they are necessary for navigation purposes.

Mr. WALSH. Why, Mr. President, let me ask the Senator if this language means that:

(f) That such grantee in the construction, maintenance, and operation of such dam or diversion structure and accessory works may, with the authority of the Secretary of War, occupy and use, to the extent necessary for the project, any lands of the United States, including the public lands.

That means that when he wants to build a dam under this act, even for the very dam site itself, bear in mind, as well as public lands that will be overflowed by the reservoir, the Secretary of War may authorize the use and occupation, to the extent necessary for the project, of those lands.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator should read further:

Any lands of the United States, including the public lands and any part of the public lands, may, on certification by the Secretary of War that the same is required for navigation purposes, be withdrawn.

Mr. WALSH. Why, Mr. President, that is an entirely different subject. That provides for the withdrawal of lands.

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly it provides for the withdrawal of lands, but the withdrawal of them for navigation purposes in connection with this project, for the construction of the dam, or for flowage purposes, or both, necessary and required in any improvement for navigation purposes.

The effort of the amendment to give the Secretary of the Interior a check upon the Secretary of War in the improvement of navigable rivers seems to me one that ought not to receive consideration for a moment.

The Senator has described how the records of the Interior Department are kept; how it is possible to go there and see in a moment, from the maps and records, what land has been sold and what land is yet the property of the Government. Therefore the Secretary of War at all times can get this information. It is as open to him as it is to any individual.

It is not to be supposed that the President is going to withdraw these lands, under the provisions of the statutes referred to, unless it is a proper case. It is to be supposed that he will consult the Secretary of the Interior wherever there is any reasonable controversy about the propriety of withdrawal. But certainly, Mr. President, the Secretary of War can be trusted to make proper investigation and safeguard the interests of the United States in such a matter. The sole authorization is to use the lands for the benefit of navigation, and I can see no reason whatsoever why the improvement of rivers should be complicated by extending the jurisdiction over them, even in part, to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to present two amendments to the bill under consideration, in order that they may be printed.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to hear the amendments read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendments.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 2, after the word "waters," it is proposed to insert:

other than streams and such streams or parts of streams as are in their ordinary, natural condition used in a substantial way for the transportation of persons or property in interstate or foreign commerce, or which through improvement heretofore or hereafter made have been or shall become usable in such commerce.

Also, it is proposed to add to section 1, on page 3, line 17, the following:

Provided further, That with respect to all other streams over which Congress has jurisdiction, under its authority to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, permission is hereby given to construct dams therein, subject, however, to removal or reconstruction, without expense to the United States, whenever the United States enters upon the improvement thereof for the purpose of making the same usable for interstate or foreign transportation: Provided, That any person who proposes to construct a dam in any such stream may make application to the Secretary of War, and thereupon may receive a permit, as provided herein, for streams used in a substantial way for the transportation of persons or property in interstate or foreign commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as I understand the amendment of the Senator from Montana, it is the one that he offered earlier in the session to-day, and provides for the insertion after the word "War" in line 12, on page 6, of the words "and the Secretary of the Interior."

I have listened for two or three days to the debate on this bill, and I confess that I have been somewhat surprised at what appear to me to be the technical objections that are made by those who favor the bill to any possible change, however unimportant the change may be, or however the suggested amendment may add to the symmetry and the betterment of the bill. I have listened to this debate, and it seems to me that the Senator from Montana has presented reasons that are unanswerable why this amendment ought to be added to the bill. I do not conceive the amendment to be nearly so important as others that have been offered or that will be offered, perhaps; but it seems to me that to make the bill consistent with the general policy of the Government we ought to add this amendment, because it is in that part of the bill where we are making provision for the taking of the public lands of the United States.

The other day, when we were discussing an amendment that was offered, I think, by the Senator from Montana and debated by some of us, it appeared to me that everybody—friend and foe of the bill alike—was converted to the desirability of the amendment, and that it would have no other effect than the improvement of the bill; and yet the Senator from Tennessee, although he appeared to me convinced that it would improve the bill, was unwilling even that a vote should be had on the amendment, but wanted it to go over until he could look further into it. It seemed to me that he was suspicious.

So far as I am concerned, I hope this bill may be very materially amended in quite a number of respects. I do not believe I would vote for the bill unless it should be quite materially amended. At the same time, I realize that that is a question that we must determine, and I think we might as well determine it at one time as at another. I know that I have no other object, in either supporting or opposing any proposed amendment, than to improve the bill from the viewpoint from which I see it.

Now, here is a provision in the bill providing for the taking of the public lands of the United States, and the Senator from Montana suggests a simple amendment providing that when such lands are to be taken we must consult the Secretary of the Interior, who, with perhaps some very few exceptions, has control and jurisdiction over all the public lands of the United States. It is that department of the Government that has in charge the public lands of the United States, and when we have any proposed laws that deal with the public lands of the United States they are referred to the Interior Department; we get evidence and information from the Interior Department. We never, so far as I know, have undertaken to take away from the Interior Department the jurisdiction the law gives that department over the public lands.

It seems to me clear that the friends of the bill ought to be able to see that, from whatever viewpoint we take it, this amendment is absolutely in harmony with the policy of all our laws and of the Government in relation to the control of public lands.

Is this bill sacred? Is there any reason why after several days of debate and honest consideration it should not be changed in some particular? Does it follow that because the amendment of the Senator from Montana proposes to give jurisdiction, or rather, to retain jurisdiction in that department, over the public lands in this particular phase of the bill, his propositions to so retain this jurisdiction should be looked upon with suspicion or considered as one that is intended in some way to injure the bill and to put it in such a shape that if enacted into law it would not be workable, as the Senator from Tennessee says?

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will say to the Senator no such suspicion exists on the part of anyone, and if anything has been said by any of the friends of the bill that in the slightest degree tends in that direction it was not intended. Of course, no one would have in any way a suspicion that anything the Senator from Montana advocated was for any improper purpose, but always in the best of faith and from the best of motives. I will further say there is no disposition upon the part of the friends of the bill to resist any amendment that will in their opinion improve it.

The Senator refers to immaterial amendments that are offered. I do not think the Senator from Montana has offered any immaterial amendments thus far, and I do not believe he would indulge in such a practice or consume the time of the Senate in offering amendments if he did not deem them material and believe that they would add to the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not charged the Senator from Montana or anyone else with offering immaterial amendments, but the Senator from Tennessee, in speaking a short time ago in regard to the very amendment which is now pending, practically said that the only thing that gave the amendment any respectability was the fact that it was offered by so able a Senator as the Senator from Montana. He seemed to argue that if this bill were amended the bill would be unworkable.

Mr. President, if I had my way, and I think such an amendment has been offered to-day, and I presume it will come up in the course of the debate, I would include the Secretary of the Interior from the very beginning of the bill. I would include the Secretary of Agriculture also, so that the permit in any instance would not be under the control of any one man.

It seems to me that the model law ought to provide for some one different from any member of the Cabinet to have charge of the giving of these permits, the taking up of the applications for permits, because the Secretary of War is changed from time to time without notice, and the appointments to that office are made without regard to the position such an appointee occupies in relation to the navigability and development of the navigation of our rivers, without regard to his ideas about how the kind of a law we are about to enact should be carried out. So we may expect, if it is left to the supervision of the Secretary of War alone, that the control of this very important measure after it becomes a law will be sometimes in the hands of friends, sometimes in the hands of enemies, and sometimes in the hands of a Secretary who has no ideas about it at all. I say this without casting any reflection upon any man who may in future years become Secretary of War. It is proper that he should be selected or, at least, that the predominating reasons for his selection should be other than the considerations involved in this particular proposed law.

So, it seems to me, outside of the proposition that this amendment applies particularly to public lands where the Secretary of the Interior has under our laws jurisdiction, I would be in favor of enlarging the authority in general under the bill. If I had my way I would include the Secretary of the Interior all the way through in connection with the Secretary of War, so that with the change of office we would not be so apt to have all those having jurisdiction of the law pass out of office at once.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will ask the Senator is it not the general rule that all Cabinet officers go out at pretty much the same time, except when occasionally there is a resignation?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; they do go out on the change of an administration, as a rule; and one of the objections to this bill as it is drawn——

Mr. SHIELDS. The man selected as Secretary of War may be just as familiar with the subject as the man selected as Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly. I do not dispute that; but the point I want to make is—and I am going to illustrate it by present conditions——

Mr. SHIELDS. Will the Senator let me finish?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly. I thought the Senator was through with his interruption.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will say to the Senator the reason why the Secretary of War was selected and given jurisdiction over this subject was because it was in the line of the jurisdiction now vested in him—that is, the control of navigable waters in the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator in saying, if there is to be only one, he is the proper person.

Mr. SHIELDS. Congress would have no power whatever to enact this bill if it did not provide for the improvement of navigation.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator in that respect.

Mr. SHIELDS. Therefore it is entirely consistent with the policy of the Government, with all existing laws on the subject of the improvement of navigable rivers, that the jurisdiction under this particular statute of the improvement of rivers and the incidental development of water power be given to that department of the Government. It was no prejudice against one office in favor of another or of the occupant of one office in favor of another. The argument that controlled the committee in giving the exclusive jurisdiction to the Secretary of War was that he has the control of navigable rivers, and it would embarrass his jurisdiction and bring about confusion if the jurisdiction were divided between two departments of the Government. I know of no case where jurisdiction of this kind is divided; but this would be the one and sole instance where the jurisdiction as to navigable rivers was divided with any other department of the Government. It was the object of the committee in preparing the bill to prevent any conflict of jurisdiction between these two departments.

I call the Senator's attention to the language of the bill on page 17. I read the provision I refer to:

And provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to irrigation or power dams or grants to municipal corporations affecting the use of water or water power for municipal purposes or to other projects approved or erected under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture upon the public lands of the United States.

The committee carefully considered the jurisdiction of the executive department over navigable rivers and over public lands and made every effort not in any way to bring about a conflict of such jurisdiction. The committee also believed that in giving the Secretary of War jurisdiction to certify lands needed for navigation purposes in connection with any improvement whoever occupied that office would be equally intelligent and equally honest as the particular person who might occupy the office of Secretary of the Interior. Of course, we all contemplate that the officers will do their duty and will so conduct themselves in the duties of their office as will be to the best interests of the Government and the people of the country. There is no reflection upon any officer, and to prevent confusion and make the bill workable this power was vested in the Secretary of War only. When I say it would be unworkable to vest it in the Secretary of the Interior I mean there might be a conflict of jurisdiction in the views of the two officers, so that there would be embarrassment in carrying such an improvement into effect.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have not charged that there was any intention on the part of the framers of the bill to cast any reflection on the head of any department of the Government. If I were going to frame the bill myself and were going to give jurisdiction of it to the head of just one department, I would give it to the Secretary of War, just as the committee has done. The reason for giving it to him has been explained by the Senator from Tennessee. I agree with him fully. That is not my objection to it. The Secretary of War has for many years had jurisdiction of the navigable streams. In this bill, if we are going to give the control of the matter into the hands of one department, the Secretary of War is the proper person. I concede that. In this particular amendment, however, the Senator from Montana undertakes to give the right to the Secretary of the Interior when they undertake to take public lands. That, I think, is consistent. The Secretary of the Interior having jurisdiction of public lands, they should not be taken without giving the Secretary of the Interior an opportunity to be heard. He ought to have charge of that matter when it comes to taking the public lands.

But on the broad general principles that I was talking about when the Senator from Tennessee interrupted me, there ought to be no head of any department that is liable to be here to-day and there to-morrow having charge of the administration of a great law like this, one that involves so much not only to the people now but to future, unborn generations. I was simply outlining my idea that the head of a department holds a changeable position and is selected without reference to what he believes in regard to the policy of development of power, without regard to his ideas on that subject, without regard to his ability on that subject, and that his designation here is inconsistent. The model thing would be to place a great enterprise like this in the hands of some official or commission which would have nothing to do but look after the powers that are developed under this law and the other law referring to public lands as we have given to the Interstate Commerce Commission jurisdiction over the railroads of the country, and these are akin to those. The power that will be developed and the industries that will flow from that development after our streams are dammed and the power generated will be perhaps second only to the great railroad systems of the country. We place those in charge of a permanent commission, one that is supposed to be not only permanent but nonpartisan and whose only business it is to look to interstate railroad propositions.

But we come now to the development of the electric power of the country, and we put that in the hands of a man selected without reference to his knowledge of the subject but selected with regard to his ideas, perhaps entirely for political purposes, to preside over a great War Department. It is proposed to put into his hands and under his control and jurisdiction the management of a great law like this, under which we expect wonderful development to take place, and he is to be immediately and closely connected not only with the development of the country but with the happiness and welfare of nearly all the people of the country.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to state to the Senator that the Secretary of War ordinarily is not such an ignoramus as he supposes.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not supposed that he is an ignoramus.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senator the Secretary of War has the Chief of Engineers and an expert body of engineers who advise him about river and harbor improvements, something that does not exist in any other department of the Government. There is no head of any department who is better advised and instructed in his public duties than the Secretary of War in reference to river and harbor improvements. They are Army officers; they are not subject to political influence; they are trained men. They are Army Engineers, hydraulic engineers, who have experience, who have charge of our river and harbor improvements. I should like to know what better hands you could put it in than such a body of men. The Secretary of War in all these cases is guided by his Chief of Engineers and the Board of Engineers.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, the Senator from Minnesota is getting under the same misapprehension of my position that the Senator from Tennessee seemed to be under. I said he is as well qualified as any other head of a department. I have said so always. He is not only as well qualified but better qualified than any other head of a department, and, as I have said, if you are going to give it to any one department, I would give it to the War Department. But that does not do away with the fact that the Secretary of War, the head of the department, is selected absolutely without reference to his knowledge of the things that are contained in this bill and over which the bill gives him jurisdiction.

The Senator says there are those in this department who are not selected from political influence. I did not charge that there were. I said, and I repeat, that the Secretary of War is selected mainly because of his political influence, and neither the Senator from Minnesota nor any other Senator can point to an instance in his recollection where political influences in every administration did not have almost the whole thing to do with the selection of the Secretary of War.

One of the objections that I was pointing out was that Secretaries may come and Secretaries may go, but these streams flow on forever. We select a Secretary and give him charge of something that he knows nothing about; he serves a year or two, resigns, and another one is selected. A different administration comes in and usually there are several changes during one administration. We have an illustration of that before us right now. In the last Congress we had two bills introduced, two bills pending in the House and the Senate as we have now—one in reference to the damming of streams and the generation of power on public lands and the other having reference to navigable streams. One of the bills was drafted mainly under the advice of the Secretary of the Interior and his experts. As the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has spoken of the experts in the War Department, I will say that the Interior Department has its experts, and they were consulted in the drafting of the bill that proposed the development of water power on the public lands.

We had that bill introduced, and then the other bill providing for the development of water power in the navigable streams was introduced. In the preparation of that bill and in its make-up the Secretary of War and his assistants were consulted. It is an open secret here, and was all the time those two bills were pending, that the Secretary of the Interior had one idea about the control of the water power in our country and that the Secretary of War had an entirely different idea. It is not my purpose to criticize either of those Secretaries; they were entitled to their ideas; but they were diametrically opposed to each other, with the result that we had one bill controlling navigable streams which was entirely different in the conservation of the resources of the country from the bill which controlled the streams on the public lands; two bills absolutely different with absolutely the same object in view. One was liberal to the water-power interests, to the men who wanted to go into the business, while the other was more conservative and tended to conserve the water power and guard it more closely than did the other bill; yet they were from the same Government in the same administration.

I happen to know—and I think every other Senator here knows—that there was a great difference between those two bills. It was stated in the newspapers that in the contests that were going on in the Capitol the President was sometimes called in to settle some of the disputes. The controversy became quite acute, because here were two bills just alike in one sense; the object was the same, to develop water power, to sell the power, and to give the people the right to use the electric energy that should be developed by falling water. Mr. President, that was the condition that arose and existed while one administration was in control.

What happened? Not long ago the Secretary of War resigned. Now there is a great deal of talk about the Secretary of the Interior being made Secretary of War. He has a different idea. Suppose he should be made Secretary of War and some man who did not agree with him should be made Secretary of the Interior, and the influence of those two departments, through the committees of the House and the Senate, should be brought to bear against this legislation. We would then have this situation: We would find that the bill providing for the development of power on the public lands of the United States would be one that would be liberal to the power men, and the bill that provided for the development of power along the navigable streams would have a tendency to conserve more completely the interests of the people of the country.

Here are two lines of thought. Honest men differ. We are going to have the Secretary of the Interior control one and the Secretary of War control the other. After these bills are passed the administration will become a very important factor, and we are going to provide that the Secretary of War shall control one and that the Secretary of the Interior shall control the other. The projects may be side by side. The power developed in one may come in direct competition with that developed under the jurisdiction of the other. In the future one Secretary, we will say, may believe in a liberal application; he may desire to let the people do about as they want to do; while the other man may say, "I want to control these powers so that we will hold down"—if you will let me use that term—"to a greater extent the men who are developing and putting their money into these enterprises." So you have two policies in the same Government, exactly contrary, and either one or both of them liable to be changed any day.

I think the model way would be to provide that both of these kinds of power, whether developed in a stream on the public lands or in navigable streams, should be placed under the same head. If I had my way about it, I would place it under some independent bureau or department of the Government that would not be subject to change, as are Cabinet officers, on the coming in or going out of an administration. I realize, however, Mr. President, that that can not be done. I am satisfied that that kind of an amendment would be too revolutionary and could not be adopted on either one of these bills.

The next thing, to my mind, would be to make a kind of commission of members of the President's Cabinet. I should like to have the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior particularly—because there are reasons why each one of those officers should be put in, they having jurisdiction over these lands—then I should like to couple with them the Secretary of Agriculture; and before the permit should be granted I would require that these three heads of the different departments should agree to the permit and to the various details of the permit. Now I will yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator, then, would take the jurisdiction over navigable rivers from the Secretary of War and the jurisdiction over the public lands from the Secretary of the Interior and vest it in this commission?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. SHIELDS. He could not take part of it.

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. SHIELDS. The only possible authority Congress has for passing this act is so far as it improves the rivers for navigable purposes. Now, I understand the Senator from Nebraska to that extent would take the jurisdiction now vested in the Secretary of War away from him——

Mr. NORRIS. No; this amendment does not seek to do that.

Mr. SHIELDS. And vest it in a board of Cabinet officers, who, of course, now have very little to do and ought to be constituted commissions to pass on a whole lot of other things.

Mr. NORRIS. There would not be any more to do if there were three men to do it than there will be if there is only one. There is just so much to be done, and somebody has got to do it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will ask the Senator how it would be possible for Congress to vest the jurisdiction over the navigable waters in part in the Secretary of the Interior or in a board, as the Senator suggests, and leave a part of it in the Secretary of War—jurisdiction over part of the river being in one Cabinet officer and jurisdiction over the other part in another—unless he is going to take the whole subject of public lands and navigable rivers away from the departments in which they are now vested and vest them in all Cabinet officers in a sort of commission form of government?

That, however, is not what I rose to suggest to the Senator. The Senator has referred to the different views which the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of War have upon this very subject of the development of water power, and he says they are directly antagonistic, and yet he advocates the placing of the development of these water powers, in part, under the jurisdiction of both of them, thus bringing about a deadlock. What stronger argument can be made against this amendment proposing to vest part of the jurisdiction in the Secretary of the Interior than the Senator himself has presented here in referring to the conflicting views of the Secretary of the Interior and of the late Secretary of War? It would be practically impossible to make any improvement under such an amendment, for the consent of both of them could hardly be obtained. The very embarrassment and confusion I have suggested as a reason why this amendment should not be agreed to is proven by the Senator's illustration.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the people of the country are so vitally interested and the future welfare of the people is so vitally concerned in this matter, that I do not want to put the determination of questions of this character in the hands of one man, especially when he is selected without regard to his views on this particular subject. If the application had to be submitted to the Secretary of War and to the Secretary of the Interior the permit when granted would be more apt to protect the rights of the people than if it were submitted to only one. If the Senator's argument is good, then we ought to abolish the Interstate Commerce Commission and appoint one man to run the commission, because he might say "If you appoint more than one you will get men who do not agree on all things; and hence we could not get anywhere." Two heads are always better than one, especially when they are heads of departments.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I suggest that, inasmuch as the President is the superior officer of both, he ought to find no great difficulty in reconciling any differences that might exist.

Mr. NORRIS. No; and an honest discussion between men who disagree, both of whom are honest, would have a tendency to bring about better results and would protect, as I believe they ought to be protected, the interest of the people before any of these rights were given away.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. Would the Senator have any objection to suspending his remarks until to-morrow?

Mr. NORRIS. No; not if the Senator wishes an adjournment.

Mr. SHIELDS. As I understand, it has been agreed that the Senate shall meet to-morrow at half past 10 o'clock; so I move that the Senate adjourn until to-morrow at that hour.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 18, 1916, at 10 o'clock and 30 minutes a. m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate February 17, 1916.

REGISTERS OF THE LAND OFFICE.

Orin M. Lane, of Watertown, S. Dak., to be register of the land office at Rapid City, S. Dak., vice John L. Burke, whose term will expire March 12, 1916.

Clyde B. Walker, of Juneau, Alaska, to be register of the land office at Juneau, Alaska, his term having expired. (Reappointment.)

RECEIVER OF PUBLIC MONEYS.

Frank A. Boyle, of Juneau, Alaska, to be receiver of public moneys at Juneau, Alaska, his term having expired. (Reappointment.)

APPOINTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

MEDICAL RESERVE CORPS.

To be first lieutenants in the Medical Reserve Corps with rank from February 12, 1916.

Frederick Smith Baird, of Michigan.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 17, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God, our heavenly Father, Thy spirit be in us; Thy wisdom guide us; Thy strength sustain us through the passing hours of this day, that no evil befall us, no temptation divert us from the work Thou hast committed to our hands, that the peace which passeth understanding may be ours now and evermore. In His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

REFERENCE OF A BILL.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 7103, a pension bill, which was mistakenly referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that that is done usually through the basket.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. But it does not seem to get there through the basket.

The SPEAKER. These bills are referred, and if they are not properly referred it can be easily corrected in that way. The Speaker has nothing to do with it.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed, on February 17, 1916, bill of the following title:

H. R. 9213. An act to authorize the Gary Land Co. to construct a bridge across the Grand Calumet River in the State of Indiana.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 3580. An act releasing the claim of the United States Government to lot No. 306 in the old city of Pensacola, Fla.;

S. 3509. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue a deed to the persons hereinafter named for part of a lot in the District of Columbia;

S. 36. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents for certain lands to the town of Duchesne, Utah;

S. 3132. An act providing for the homestead entry of certain lands in the State of Washington, and for other purposes;

S. 809. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to accept the application for land entry of Richard Daeley;

S. 922. An act for the relief of Mary E. Nicolson;

S. 6. An act authorizing issuance of patent for certain lands to Thomas L. Griffiths;

S. 584. An act to provide a headstone for the grave of Scarlet Crow;

S. 1376. An act for the relief of Peter McKay;

S. 1048. An act for the relief of Warren E. Day;

S. 3581. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent to that portion of land being a fractional block bounded on the north and east by Bayou Cadet, on the west by Cevallos Street, and on the south by Intendencia Street, in the old city of Pensacola, in the State of Florida;

S. 1793. An act granting to the State of Kansas title to certain lands in said State for use as a game preserve; and

S. J. Res. 60. Joint resolution creating a joint subcommittee from the memberships of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to investigate the conditions relating to interstate and foreign commerce and the necessity of further legislation relating thereto, and defining the powers and duties of such subcommittee.

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills and a joint resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 3580. An act releasing the claim of the United States Government to lot No. 306 in the old city of Pensacola, Fla.; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 3509. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue a deed to the persons hereinafter named for part of a lot in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 36. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents for certain lands to the town of Duchesne, Utah; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 3132. An act providing for the homestead entry of certain lands in the State of Washington, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 809. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to accept the application for land entry of Richard Daeley; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 922. An act for the relief of Mary E. Nicolson; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 6. An act authorizing issuance of patent for certain lands to Thomas L. Griffiths; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 584. An act to provide a headstone for the grave of Scarlet Crow; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

S. 1376. An act for the relief of Peter McKay; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 1048. An act for the relief of Warren E. Day; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 3581. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent to that portion of land bounded on the north and east by Bayou Cadet, on the west by Cevallos Street, and on the south by Intendencia Street, in the old city of Pensacola, in the State of Florida; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 1793. An act granting to the State of Kansas title to certain lands in said State for use as a game preserve; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. J. Res. 60. Joint resolution creating a joint subcommittee from the membership of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to investigate the conditions relating to interstate and foreign commerce and the necessity of further legislation relating thereto, and defining the powers and duties of such subcommittee; to the Committee on Rules.

KINGS HILL IRRIGATION DISTRICT.

Mr. McCRACKEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the bill (H. R. 10647) for the purchase of the Kings Hill irrigation system, in southern Idaho, which has been referred to the Committee on Appropriations, as I desire to introduce a substitute for it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the gentleman introduce the substitute. The substitute will be referred to the proper committee and the committee will ignore the original.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10484, the Post Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10484, the Post Office appropriation bill, with Mr. RAINEY in the chair.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, before gentlemen who desire to discuss the matter at some length proceed, I regard it as not inappropriate, in view of certain statements that have been made by the chairman of the Railway Mail Pay Association of the United States, through the public press, to refer to the same. I shall not read in full the article that has been published in most of the newspapers of the United States, but will refer briefly to some of the charges made therein. First, they deny that there is a lobby here in their interest against this bill, and then they say the House Post Office Committee proposes a law that will give the Post Office Department the right to name the rates and all conditions of service for handling the mails, and that it will compel submission to its orders by confiscatory fines. Again, they want to know why it is that the Post Office Department is not willing that the question should be referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which now regulates rates allowed for all other forms of traffic. They charge also, in substance, that this bill is confiscatory and deprives the railroads of their property without just compensation under the Constitution.

I desire to make a brief and dispassionate statement in reference to these charges. It was said by the chairman of this committee that he believed, he knew, there was a lobby here. He did not charge, nor did he intimate, nor is it true, so far as I am aware, that there is any corrupt effort to influence legislation in this case. I believe if there had been, we would have discovered it. I know of nothing of that sort, and have made no such charge, but it does not necessarily follow that a lobby, when charged, means an effort to corrupt. It is a strong and powerful influence maintained outside of the legislative halls to influence legislation that ordinarily we call a lobby.

This bill, in a more drastic form than is now presented, was passed by the last House of Representatives. From the hour that the Senate and the House adjourned, the Senate having failed to act upon this measure by reason of other matters pending at the hour of adjournment, Mr. Peters, who wrote and published this article, throughout the country began the work of opposition to the effort of Congress to correct mail conditions and pay and to maintain the present condition as against the new space basis proposed. A new Congress had come in, the Post Office Committee had not actually been appointed, and yet we find in the newspapers at that time and in private pamphlets assaults upon the committee, charging it with being unjust and unfair, assaults upon the Post Office Department, assaults upon all connected with this matter, and that has been kept up all along. It has not abated one iota. What else? We find publications in all the papers, and we find in nearly every commercial body in the United States a stereotyped resolution saying that this measure is unjust and unfair and confiscatory and ought not to be passed. Of course those commercial bodies do not know anything about the facts, could not have known them, because this bill was not in existence when they were passed.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman recall a resolution passed by a chamber of commerce in the State of Pennsylvania, in which it was petitioning the Post Office Committee to pass the Moon bill?

Mr. MOON. Yes; I recall that; but that application was on the outside of the petition, and on the inside was the resolution against it. They have been uniform in opposition. That looks like a propaganda of some sort; call it a lobby, if you choose, but certainly it is an effort to influence on the outside of Congress the legislation in Congress. Every Member in this House has unquestionably received numbers of telegrams on this question. When this House was debating the Post Office appropriation bill a few days ago there were men sitting right here in the gallery who had been talking to Members about the bill—not improperly at all, because I know nothing of that sort, and they have a right to talk in reference to it, if they see fit.

But that only sustains the charge of an outside influence attempting to control the legislation. Now, there have been three commissions on this question. The last one fixed the highest rates for railway mail pay of any that have acted. This bill carries in it the compensation fixed by that commission for railway mail pay. It is the highest figure, as I have stated, ever carried in a measure of this sort. In comparison with passenger rates the rates here fixed are equal to the passenger rates less 10 per cent, obviously for the reason that the risk of the carrying of passengers and the cost attending it would make at least that difference. That is the view of the department; that is the view of the interstate statistician. Now, this committee does not like to be charged with acting unfairly or unjustly, and I know this House does not like it. We want to do nothing except that which is just to the railroads and just to the people. We have given them this highest rate in the bill. Well, what is the effect of it? It is to give them in dollars and cents about $4,000,000 or four and a half million—and some insist it is more—more money for carrying the mails than they have ever yet received on the weight basis. The difference, we thought, was worth the amount. In other words, it would pay us to go to the space basis if we had to pay the $4,000,000 more than we do under the weight basis for the simple reason that we would know just what we were doing; we would have a definite contract fixing a definite space for a definite time by which we know exactly the amount that we were paying, while under the present basis you can not come within $15,000,000 of it, as three Postmasters General have said. Now, is it confiscatory to change from one basis to another when the result of the change will bring $4,000,000 more to the railroad companies than the old system? I think that no reasonable man would make that contention. We are aware that the bill must be made to meet a general average. You can not meet each and every isolated case. Some of these short-line railroads that make frequent trips are getting too much or will get a little too much. That may be adjusted under the power of the Postmaster General. Some of these lines are going to get too little—they will get more under this bill than under the old law—but they will still get too little, but that is a very small minority.

We have provided in this bill that any road that is not satisfied with the pay that it is receiving may go to the Postmaster General and make a contract for a higher rate, a power that has never existed under the law before. Well, that ought to meet the necessities that arise from that condition; but the railroad companies say, they have insisted, that Congress shall not act on this question, but shall delegate all of its legislative power and authority to the Interstate Commerce Commission. I assume that this body is not yet ready to abrogate. We have in this bill fixed a maximum rate, we have determined in our judgment what the pay shall be; but to meet the possible necessity, to meet the argument of the railroad companies, we have gone further and we have done that which they have insisted ought to be done, not in its full sense, because we did not give up all power and authority, but we have said to them, if this rate does not satisfy you, if you can not make contracts with the Postmaster General that suit you, then we provide that you may go to the Interstate Commerce Commission to have a rate fixed there that will be satisfactory. Could there be anything more just than that? Are we ready to say to these roads that we will not legislate at all, we will dump this whole question on the Interstate Commerce Commission, where in years to come it may be decided? But, sirs, the bottom of this whole question is disclosed in this article, covertly disclosed, it is a fact known to everybody, it is a fight of the express companies through the railroads against the Parcel Post System of the United States. Now, if we buy that space, if we pay for it adequately, if we pay for it all the time, whether it is loaded or not loaded, who will say that we have not the right to use it as we see fit, and if in the doing of it we fill it with parcel post at a less rate for transportation to the great mass of the people, what right has the railroad company to complain of that fact? They are giving us what we pay for and no more. There is the point involved in this whole question. They have answered us time and again in the examinations that it made no difference whether we paid them a compensatory price or a price beyond that, that it made no difference if we gave them the right to complain of the contract; that it made no difference if we gave them the right to appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission; still they are not willing to go to this system, still they are not willing to abandon the antiquated, indefinite, and uncertain manner in which the question of payment is now settled. The reason is clear. They want to throttle and destroy the Parcel Post System of the United States, and they will succeed in doing it if we do not adopt the space basis, and the reason is that the railroad owners of the United States are also the owners of the express companies in part.

Now, I have felt it necessary to make this brief statement in view of the adroit and false insinuations that have been made in these publications. It is a matter of no consequence to me personally. I have not the slightest tinge of prejudice against the railroad companies and have not any reason for it, and I know you have not; but this question here is whether, by making a statutory contract, we are to be controlled by the interested railroad companies or whether we are in justice to the people bound to make a contract that is fair and just not only to the citizen but to the railroad company. [Applause.]

Mr. STEENERSON rose.

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman want to use some of his time?

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not think so, and I suggest that the gentleman use some of his time.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD].

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, the pending appropriation bill carries the largest amount that was ever carried in a bill of this character. The Post Office Department is one which gradually develops, and necessarily the expenditures of each recurring year will be larger than the expenditures of the preceding year. This is one of the most important bills that comes before this body. It is important, because it reaches every home. Every man, woman, and child of this Republic is interested in what the Post Office Department does. In the speeches which have been made thus far on the Post Office bill there have been a number of strictures against officials of the Post Office Department. It has been charged, amongst other things, that the Post Office Department is partisan; that the administration of the affairs of the Post Office Department are partisan in their character are therefore not efficient because partisan. I think gentlemen who will carefully investigate the situation must admit that while the present Postmaster General is a partisan himself that no man can truthfully charge that the administration of the affairs of the Post Office Department under the present Postmaster General is partisan in character. It is a notorious fact that one of his assistants until with the last few months was a Republican. It is true to-day, according to investigations made by individuals outside the department, that more than one-half, yes, more than 60 per cent, of the employees of the Post Office Department in Washington are Republican in politics.

Every man knows, who has taken upon himself to make inquiry, that the present Postmaster General will not allow in any branch of the service, if he can avoid it, more than 50 per cent of Democrats. In the selection of superintendents of divisions that have charge of the various branches of the service outside of Washington he follows strictly the rule that there shall be no more Democrats than there are of the opposition.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], in speaking of the Post Office Service, made the charge to which I have referred, and amongst other things quoted a statement which was found in the report of the Third Assistant Postmaster General, as follows:

> It is a noteworthy fact that in no other activity, governmental or private, are conditions of prosperity or depression more quickly reflected than in the revenues of the Postal Establishment. Having a close relation to the affairs of the people, the postal receipts may be used as a thermometer, as it were, to ascertain existing conditions of business and as a barometer to forecast those to come.

The gentleman from Minnesota quoted this statement approvingly, and said it was correct, and then he undertook to show that the Third Assistant Postmaster General and the other officials of the Post Office Department had not correctly stated the situation and had misled the country as to the real condition in the Post Office Department. Amongst other things he gives a table in which he undertakes to show that the postal receipts in the United States, if we had continued the fourth-class rate as it was prior to the adoption of the present parcel-post law, would have been less in 1913, 1914, and 1915, than they had been in the preceding years. He gives a table in which he says that in 1912 the receipts were $251,000,000 in round numbers. In 1913 if the parcel post had not been in existence the receipts would have been $235,000,000; in 1914, $234,000,000; in 1915, $234,000,000. In order to reach this conclusion he takes out of the aggregate what he claims is the excess which has been received by the department each year from the parcel-post establishment.

In 1913 he gives as the amount that should be deducted—that the Post Office Department would have received under the old system of fourth-class rates—$8,000,000 in round figures; in 1914, $8,600,000; in 1915, $8,600,000. He bases this on the rates which were originally paid under the fourth-class rate. He unwittingly stated that these rates were 8 cents a pound. When his attention is called to it I am sure he will recognize the fact that the original rates were 16 cents a pound instead of 8.

Mr. STEENERSON. For fourth-class mail?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman is utterly mistaken. It is 8 cents a pound for books and 16 cents for merchandise.

Mr. LLOYD. Under the original law the second-class rate was 1 cent a pound, the third-class rate was 8 cents a pound, and the fourth-class rate was 16 cents a pound. There can be no question of that fact.

Mr. STEENERSON. On books.

Mr. LLOYD. Books at that time were in the third-class division, and received for transportation 8 cents a pound.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; and you put them in the fourth class.

Mr. LLOYD. But that does not change the class. I am calling attention to what the class was. The class provided that the pay should be 16 cents a pound, and the gentleman in his statement says that they were 8 cents a pound. Now, if they were 16 cents a pound it will be plainly shown that these figures should be doubled, and if they are doubled and the deduction made in accordance with his plan, then in 1913 the receipts would have been $243,000,000; in 1914, $252,000,000; and in 1915, $242,000,000.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. I will.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman's theory is faulty, it seems to me, in this, that since the order of March 14, placing books in parcel post they have constituted a very large percentage of the parcel post which formerly carried 8 cents a pound. That is all we made on them, namely, 8 cents a pound; all the postage we got on them. The amount that formerly went to the parcel post at 16 cents a pound was a very small amount, as you will see by consulting the table.

Mr. LLOYD. The amount that was carried at the third-class rate under the old law was not much compared with the other figures, and the gentleman in his statement says that they were 5.52 of the amount of the weight of the mail. Taking that as the basis—5.52—and then changing the rate, as he must necessarily do, from 8 cents a pound to 16 cents a pound, the increase would be as I stated a moment ago. The gentleman also makes a mistake which, I am sure, he will be glad to correct. In 1912 he says that the total postal receipts were $251,000,000. The record shows that the postal receipts were $246,744,000.

Mr. STEENERSON. That is simply an error.

Mr. LLOYD. That, of course, is a mistake, to which he will readily agree. Now, he makes a deduction from that statement, that the Post Office Department, if it had not been for the parcel post, would have shown a rapid decline in receipts instead of progress, or increased receipts, when the truth is that the postal receipts in 1913, 1914, and 1915 were greater than the postal receipts in any year prior to 1912.

Now, the postal receipts in 1913, if added parcel-post receipts are omitted, were only $3,000,000 less than the postal receipts in 1912.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield? The Post Office Department, in a letter written to Mr. GRIEST—and I have it in my pocket—estimated that the last fiscal year the parcel-post receipts alone amounted to $64,000,000, and the official report shows the total is $287,000,000. Now, if you deduct 64 from 287 it is only 223.

Mr. LLOYD. I am coming to that later. I am talking about the argument you make at this point, and this argument shows beyond any question, according to the figures, that the Post Office Department increased its receipts in the first year of the Wilson administration over $8,000,000, and that the postal receipts began to decline after one year and five months of the Wilson administration. From the 4th day of March, 1913, to the 1st day of August, 1914, according to the gentleman's own figures, there was a rapid and marked increase in the receipts of the postal establishment, and, according to the statement which he indorses, it would show beyond any question the prosperity of the country under the Democratic administration.

Now, there is another table which he made, and I do not understand why he made it. It is an appendix to his speech. He compared the receipts by months for the years 1910, 1911, and 1912, and the years 1913, 1914, and 1915. I have taken it upon myself to make a computation. These are calendar years, not fiscal years. The three years 1910, 1911, and 1912 are the last three years of the Taft administration. The calendar years 1913, 1914, and 1915 were nearly wholly under the Wilson administration.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes, sir.

Mr. STAFFORD. In this tabulation, do you state the amount of increase, as the Postmaster General has stated from time to time, due to the inauguration of the parcel-post business, which started January 1, 1913?

Mr. LLOYD. What I am proposing to do now is to give the table which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] gave, only to divide it into two parts. I divide the table into two groups of years, the first including the years 1910, 1911, and 1912, the last three years of the Taft administration, and compare them with 1913, 1914, and 1915, the first three years of the Wilson administration.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that all the figures in that table were furnished to me by the Post Office Department, and that the only thing I did was to compute the percentages in the last column, and the reason for taking calendar years is that I am comparing them by months?

Mr. LLOYD. That is correct, so far as I know. I am sure the gentleman would never put it in his statement if he did not believe it to be correct. The gentleman is too fair and just and accurate in his dealings with the House to make any attempt at misrepresentation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman think it is a fair comparison to show the business of the country by taking the postal receipts of the respective years when the Postal Department, in January, 1913, took on an added service, namely, the parcel post, which ran into millions of dollars?

Mr. LLOYD. Whether it is fair or unfair, I did not do it. This was done by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], and I am simply calling attention to what he did to show the necessary results of the figures which he gave.

Let me give you figures. He gives them by months. Now, take the month of January. The aggregate figures in 1910, 1911, and 1912 for January were $29,000,000. For January, 1913, 1914, and 1915 the aggregate was $36,500,000.

For February the aggregate for 1910, 1911, and 1912, under the Republican régime, was $28,200,000. February for 1913, 1914, and 1915, under the Democratic régime, the aggregate was $33,900,000.

In March, according to the gentleman's figures, the aggregate was $33,200,000 for the years 1910, 1911, and 1912, under the Taft administration, and $39,300,000 for the years 1913, 1914, and 1915 under the Wilson administration.

For April the aggregate was $29,400,000, under the Taft administration, and $36,120,000 under the Wilson administration.

For May the aggregate was $27,600,000 under Taft and $34,500,000 under Wilson.

For June the aggregate was $27,300,000, under the Republican administration, and $33,400,000 under the Wilson administration.

And so on all the way through, showing an increase, and a large increase, in each of the aggregate of months for the Democratic period over that of the last three years of the Republican administration. The total under these figures shows that in the calendar years 1910, 1911, and 1912 the total receipts were $351,600,000, while under the Wilson administration in 1913, 1914, and 1915, for the three calendar years named, the amount was $432,600,000, or $81,000,000 more than under the Taft administration.

Mr. STEENERSON. How much is there left when you take out the parcel post?

Mr. LLOYD. I am taking the figures as the gentleman from Minnesota gave them, and he evidently had some purpose in making those figures. Just what that purpose was I do not know, but I am undertaking to show from the figures which the gentleman gave that it proves that the Democratic administration was more successful than was the Republican administration.

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, the gentleman understands the purpose very well. It was——

Mr. LLOYD. Evidently the purpose was to show that the Republican administration had been more successful in securing receipts than had been the Democratic administration.

Mr. STEENERSON. I hope the gentleman will yield there.

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. This table comprises six years, by months, and up to 1913 we had no parcel post; and I devoted a large part of my argument to showing that it was not a correct method to determine the business prosperity of the country by comparing the receipts of different periods when in one period you had a new class of mailable matter in the mail. I wanted to show the actual figures, because when you deduct the amount of parcel post, as you say, you will see that the actual receipts from the old business were less than they were before.

Mr. LLOYD. And when you have done that, it is shown that in 1914, the first year of the Democratic administration, the receipts were $9,000,000 more, not regarding the parcel post, than they had ever been before.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Does the gentleman regard that as a phenomenal increase, when the gentleman's own Postmaster General says the normal increase ought to be 7 per cent? I have been perfectly liberal with you. I have allowed for the matter of parcel post to a greater extent than I ought to have; but $9,000,000 is a very small percentage on $300,000,000, and therefore it shows a very small increase, when the normal increase ought to be 7 per cent.

Mr. LLOYD. Yes. The gentleman's statement shows that the normal increase is 7¼ per cent, when the increase in the first year of the Democratic administration was over 9 per cent.

Mr. STEENERSON. Including parcel post?

Mr. LLOYD. No; not including parcel post.

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, certainly; including parcel post.

Mr. LLOYD. Now, another suggestion: The gentleman in his speech calls attention to what he says is "the trouble with this administration." He says it has not been partisan in a personal way, but that the trouble with this administration has been in the conception of what the function of the Postal Service is. "The function of the Postal Service is," according to his statement, "to render the people service at the lowest practicable cost and to treat the employees fairly." That is a good statement of the duty of the Post Office Department. And then, a little later, he says: "The first proposition put forth by the Post Office Department was to save some twenty or thirty million dollars on the Rural Free Delivery Service. They have brought an estimate in here to cut the rural carriers by $20,000,000."

His complaint is that a Democratic Postmaster General undertook to save to this Government $20,000,000; and I suppose there is no one within the sound of my voice who has looked into this proposition but what will say that if Congress had seen fit to adopt the suggestion which he made there would have been a saving of at least $15,000,000. What was the suggestion? It was that the Rural Service, instead of being allowed to have fixed salaries for its carriers, should have some system similar to the star-route system, and that every route should be let by contract. Certainly everyone here will admit that if that had been adopted there would have been a saving of at least one-third of the present cost. If not so much as that, it is perfectly safe to make the statement that there would have been a saving of at least $15,000,000.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. The Democratic Party being in control of both branches of Congress and of the Executive, why did they not adopt that system?

Mr. LLOYD. This House did not agree to it simply because it thought, and the gentleman did not agree to it because he thought, it would affect the efficiency of the service. That is the truth about it. I was not favorable to it. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] was not favorable to it. I am sure this House was not. And yet what are we doing? We are paying $15,000,000 a year in order to bring about the most efficient possible service, when we know very well that we could have a service which the Post Office Department believes would be just as efficient for $15,000,000 less.

There has been very much of complaint against the Post Office Department by some individuals because of its attempt at economy. There is one thing very sure. If any one has watched carefully the course of the present Postmaster General and the officials in the service against whom complaint is made, he will admit that every attempt, whether wise or unwise, was an attempt which, if carried out, would have resulted in less expense to the American people.

There is another thing. Certainly no man will question the honesty, the ability, the courage, the desire to do the right thing, in the present Postmaster General. He has done everything in his power to make this an economical and efficient service, and it is unfair to charge him with partisanship in the management of the affairs of this great department of the Government.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] and others in this debate have raised the question as to whether the parcel post is a paying venture. In the first place, you must recognize the fact that the parcel-post law was adopted prior to the time of the present administration, and it is the duty of the Postmaster General to carry out the provisions of the parcel-post law as best he can. The latest figures given out by the Post Office Department—and I suppose the Post Office Department know more about it than anybody else—are to the effect that on every pound of parcel-post matter on an average there is a profit of two-thirds of 1 cent. They figure out that this in the last year produced $10,000,000 profit; in other words, that the parcel-post establishment in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, produced $10,000,000 more than it cost to run that establishment. Now, I do not know whether those figures are correct or not. I am not inclined to believe they are, and yet I have no way of disproving them. I am somewhat like the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON]. I am doubtful about the proposition.

Mr. STEENERSON. The report shows that there was a deficit of $11,000,000 in the last fiscal year, and they claim that they made some $11,000,000 or $12,000,000 on parcel post. How does the gentleman explain that, if it be correct that they made $12,000,000 on the parcel post?

Mr. LLOYD. Ten million dollars on the parcel post.

Mr. STEENERSON. Well, say they made $10,000,000 on the parcel post and there was a deficit of $11,000,000 in the postal finances, the two figures together make $21,000,000, which must have been lost on the other mail outside of parcel post.

Mr. LLOYD. No; according to the gentleman's own statement, which he prepared, there should be some allowance for what would have been carried under the old system of fourth-class mail matter.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; but that was profitable.

Mr. LLOYD. I want to be perfectly frank in this matter. If the Post Office Department is correct in this statement that there was a profit of $10,000,000 on account of parcel post, there can be no question but what if there had been no parcel-post law the deficiency would have been greater than $11,000,000. That answers the gentleman.

Mr. STEENERSON. It would have been something like $20,000,000.

Mr. LLOYD. No; but it would have been more than $11,000,000. But I accept, and I suppose the gentleman will accept, these figures of the Post Office Department as being correct because we can not produce a statement showing a different result, which would be satisfactory to ourselves or to them.

Mr. STEENERSON. Would we not have been able to do that, approximately, more correctly if we had had a distinctive stamp which the law required but which was abolished without the permission or action of Congress?

Mr. LLOYD. That distinctive stamp was abolished for a splendid purpose. To a great many people the distinctive stamp was a nuisance because they could not take advantage of the parcel post unless they had at hand parcel-post stamps, and in order to accommodate the people that feature of the law was changed.

Mr. LOBECK. Is it not more difficult to come at the profits or losses of the parcel post because of not having this distinctive stamp?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes; I think it makes it more difficult. And yet it seems to me that the present system of ascertainment is a reasonable method of ascertainment.

Mr. LOBECK. Will the gentleman explain it?

Mr. LLOYD. Here is what they have done: Between the 1st day of April and the 15th day of April, 1913, and the 1st day of October and the 15th day of October, 1913, and the 1st day of April and the 15th day of April, 1914, and the 1st and 15th days of October, 1914, and the 1st and 15th days of April 1915, and the 1st and 15th of October, 1915, they made a complete weighing of the parcel post, and from that weighing they have made an estimate of what was actually carried during the year.

Mr. Chairman, I wish now to call attention to one of the provisions of this bill in the proposed new legislation, to wit, the changed method of ascertainment of railway mail pay. One of the most difficult questions to determine with which we have had anything to do is what should be the pay for carrying the mail.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Was not the gentleman from Missouri a member of the Bourne Commission, and was not that commission composed of Republicans and Democrats including now Senator WEEKS, but then a Member of the House of Representatives, and did not they make a unanimous report to Congress in favor of the space plan, substantially as proposed in this bill?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I was undertaking to call attention to the fact that the question of ascertainment of railway mail pay has puzzled many persons in the past. No man unless he is an expert can to-day satisfactorily explain to any assembly of people the present system of ascertainment of railway mail pay. It is one of the most complicated systems I ever tried to unravel. It is called the weight basis, and yet we do not pay according to the weight that actually goes on the train. We pay on a system of averages rather than on the total weight. We ascertain the full amount of mail that goes out on a route, the average amount, and the average amount that comes back on the same route, then combining the two we obtain an average for that route. But the method of obtaining that average is very difficult and intricate to work out in mathematics.

The people of the United States have been anxious for years to have some kind of a simple system so that they might themselves know whether the amount paid the railroad companies was a reasonable amount or not. No man to-day who is not an expert can tell whether the present system brings about anything like a correct compensation to the railroad companies, and until very recently the railroad companies had little knowledge themselves as to whether they were receiving too much or too little.

I think every member of the Bourne Commission who devoted months of study to this important question, began his investigation with the idea that the space basis was not the best system. Every member of that commission was impressed with the idea that something should be done to change the present system and simplify it. But as the facts developed, as information came before the committee, we were all impressed with the idea that the very best system that could be adopted was the space system.

The people, as I stated, I am sure, are anxious that there should be some kind of a simple system that they can understand. The railroad companies have objected to the present system because they claim that it does not furnish a sufficient compensation to them. They make this statement: That investigations made by the Post Office Department, by the Bourne committee, by their own committee on railway mail pay, and through information obtained from the Interstate Commerce Commission show that the present weight system should remain, but that there should be three changes made in connection with the management. One is that instead of weighing the mail, as we do now, once in four years, the mail should be weighed at least once a year. They claim that by reason of the fact that the mail is only weighed once in four years there is a large amount of mail carried for which they receive no compensation. There can be no question of the fact that they have not received pay for carrying a vast amount of mail in various years that have passed. They insist that in addition to that they ought to have pay for what is called the apartment car. They insist that a full railway car 60 feet in length, which is a traveling post office, and a 40-foot car in length, which is a traveling post office, should be paid for according to space. They insist that they ought to have pay where the space is less than 40 feet, and wherever a railway mail clerk goes into a car and distributes mail and it becomes necessary for the Post Office Department to prepare any equipment for him in which the mail may be distributed they should have pay for the space used in that service.

They complain, in the third place, that they are required to do that which a railroad company ought not to do, because it is no part of its duty, to wit, to carry mails from the station to a post office which may be within 80 rods of the station. They claim that if this duty is required of them that that 80 rods should be added to the length of the route, and that they should receive pay for carrying the mail over the 80 rods, the same as they would if it was a part of the railroad track.

Now, that I may not be misunderstood, I say they ask three things—that there be annual weighing; second, pay for apartment cars; third, that they be relieved of the duty of carrying the mail to these post offices within 80 rods and to dispose of the mails in the terminals.

The space plan which is proposed to be adopted is a perfectly simple system. Here a railway post-office car, under the new system, starts out from Washington to Baltimore, a full car. Any man can answer what the railroad company will receive for carrying that car. It will be 21 cents for every mile that car travels. If you get on a railroad train yourself to go to Baltimore, what do you pay? You pay 2 or 2½ cents a mile for traveling between here and Baltimore. What would be the pay for the railway post-office car? Twenty-one cents a mile. Statistics ascertained by the Interstate Commerce Commission show that the average number of passengers who ride on a passenger coach is 12, and that the pay received is a little above 2 cents a mile on the average, and that it amounts to about 25 cents a mile. That is the amount received by the railroad company for the transportation of a passenger car 1 mile. Twenty-five cents for handling a passenger car for 1 mile, on which 12 passengers ride. We propose in this bill that for a railway postal car there shall be paid 21 cents a mile for every mile it may be hauled.

You can readily see from the comparison the reasonableness of the proposed payment of 21 cents. In addition to the 21 cents, what we call the line charge, there is a slight charge which is necessary to be made in order to equalize the service and give to it the proper compensation, and that is a terminal charge, so that the railroad company will receive compensation for the preparation that is necessary in arranging its car for transportation and for the work that it is to perform after the car has reached its destination with its mail. These we call the terminal charges, and a small sum of $2 for the initial service and the terminal service is provided in this bill. You can readily see the purpose of that and you can readily see the merit of it. That has nothing to do with distance, because it is just as much trouble to load the mail on a train, or prepare for loading, if the road to be traveled is 10 miles long as it is if the road to be traveled is a thousand miles long, so that the initial and terminal charge should be accounted for without reference to the length of the run.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. LOBECK. How about the 80 rods terminal charge in small towns or cities?

Mr. LLOYD. Under the provisions of the bill the 80-rod charge may be made or may not be made. The matter is in the discretion of the Post Office Department as to whether the railroad company shall be required to transport the mail from the station to the post office that may be within 80 rods.

Mr. LOBECK. Should it not be directed?

Mr. LLOYD. There are some instances where it is a proper thing for them to pay and there are other instances where it is a burden which should not be borne by the railroad companies. There can be no fixed rule with reference to it.

Mr. LOBECK. I am asking for information.

Mr. LLOYD. But if the Post Office Department upon investigation finds that this obligation which is now imposed upon the railroad company should not exist, it has the power to take it from it, and to provide for the carriage of the mail from the station to the post office without reference to distance.

The railroad companies apparently do not object in all the recent statements that have been made to the compensation that is proposed in these bills. What they object to is what they claim will be the administration under it. They claim that so much power is left to the Postmaster General that he will exercise that power in the interest of economy, and that they will not secure the amount of money to which they are entitled. My candid judgment is that under this bill, instead of it costing $4,000,000 extra to carry out the provisions of it, when it is economically administered it will not cost the Government one cent more than the present system.

The truth about it is that the compensation which will be received by the railroad companies in the next year, if this bill is adopted, in my judgment, will be practically the same compensation which they receive at the present time. But the question of annual weighing is overcome. The question of apartment-car service is settled and there is an opportunity for the Post Office Department to give to them that which they demand in connection with the terminal service, if the Post Office Department is satisfied that the service which they render is a service which should not be rendered by them, but which should be borne by the Government. This new scheme of the space basis is objected to by the railroad companies. They object seriously to it, as you see from the public prints and from the telegrams which you have all found on your desks; but why do they object? What is the purpose in objecting to it? It is not to the charge that they receive. I have placed it in a nutshell when I say that their sole objection, in fact, rests upon what they believe will be the mistreatment in administration. I do not think there is genuine foundation for that charge. The present Postmaster General and the officials under him will see to it that the railroad companies receive every cent that is due them, in my judgment. Under the proposed plan every particle of matter that goes into a railroad train will be paid for by the Government. There can never again be any charge that there is a large per cent of the mail for which the railroad companies receive no compensation. Why? Because the bill specifically provides that the Post Office Department must authorize the space to be used. If the Post Office Department authorizes that space, and it is necessary to use more space, there is no obligation on the part of the railroad company to use any additional space. The duty devolves upon the Post Office Department to ask them for all the space it needs in the transportation of the mail, and for every particle of space that may be used the railroad will receive a fixed compensation.

Mr. LOBECK. The gentleman means in addition to what space is ordered in the commencement?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. LOBECK. But if the department, then, has ordered so many feet of space, whether it occupies it or not, it has to pay for it?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes. One of the complaints made in the argument by the railroad companies with reference to the space plan is that the Post Office Department will probably take advantage of them in the matter of storage cars. A storage car is one that may be filled with mail which is not distributed en route. It is mail that is carried in a full car from one point to another. There is no foundation for that charge, because this bill specifically provides that the maximum space used shall be the space paid for for the whole journey, both outgoing and returning. Suppose it should be that a car was started out with 40,000 pounds of mail, which is the largest possible amount that anybody claims could go into a car, yet in no instance will it be true that there will be 40,000 pounds of mail carried to the terminal and 40,000 pounds of mail carried back to the initial point. So that there is no foundation for that claim. The truth is that at the present time the storage cars are carrying from 7 to 8 tons. This statement that they may carry 40,000 pounds is a possibility. That is, it is possible that at some time from the time the car starts upon its journey until it returns to the initial point there may be a time when 40,000 pounds are carried, but it is a perfectly safe statement to make that the average amount of mail that will be carried in storage cars will never exceed 8 tons.

Mr. Chairman, I notice my time has about expired. This proposition in reference to the change of mail pay is an exceedingly important one. I am anxious that every individual shall candidly investigate this matter, that no one shall be biased or misled by any statement that he receives by telegram or through the press. The individuals who are sending the telegrams in nearly every instance are individuals who actually do not know what would be the effect of the passage of this bill. There are very few railroad men—I doubt whether there is a railroad president in the United States to-day who knows what will be the effect of the adoption of the space system, but some employee about him has said to him that it will be unfair, and because that employee has said it is unfair the railroad president and railroad employee insist it is unfair and send to you a telegram, which says to you: "Do not support the measure, because it is unfair." The people who know most about this are the people in Washington, the people who have investigated it with the railroads railway mail committee. These have the information in regard to the situation. It is a rather remarkable thing that there have been three commissions appointed whose duty it was to carefully investigate the subject of railway mail pay, and each of those commissions have decided in favor of the space plan. Every commission and every body of men, as far as I know, excepting those interested in the proposition from a personal standpoint, who have investigated this subject have reached the conclusion that the correct system of pay is the space method of pay. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, if I have any time remaining, I desire to yield it back. I think I have consumed all of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back five minutes.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I suggest the other side use some time now.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to my colleague [Mr. RODENBERG].

Mr. RODENBERG. Mr. Chairman, I represent a district whose material welfare is largely dependent upon the prosperity of the railroads of the country. The city of East St.

Louis, which is the largest city in my district, is the terminus of 24 different railroads. These railroad companies give employment to a very large percentage of the population of my district. Any legislation that has a tendency to curtail the earning power of the railroads vitally affects the material interests of these employees. We are all aware that the question of securing an increase in wages is now being agitated by railroad employees. In fact, the newspapers have stated within the last few days that there is a very strong probability of the inauguration of a general strike on the part of the employees, unless this increase in wages is granted by the employers.

Taken as a whole, the railroad employees are men of high character and intelligence, who fully appreciate that there is a strong community of interest between employer and employee. They believe in protecting the rights of the railroad companies as well as their own. Last summer various committees, representing different railroad labor organizations, called on me to protest vigorously against the enactment of the legislation proposed in this bill, on the ground that it would work a most decided hardship on the railroads and materially reduce their earning capacity. They felt, and justly so, that any legislation which would result in decreasing the revenues of the railroads would necessarily lessen their chances to secure an increase in wages. As a result of these representations and of the statements made to me by responsible railroad officials, I have tried to make a careful examination of the provisions of this bill, and after doing so, and after trying to digest the voluminous hearings, I am forced to the conclusion that that part of the bill which proposes to change the method of railway mail pay from a "weight" to a "space" basis is wholly unfair to the railroads as well as to the public, and should not be enacted into law.

The bill proposes to change the method which has determined compensation for handling and hauling mail matter since the organization of this Government and to pay, not for the service rendered, but for the instrumentality employed. My objection to this change is based upon the belief that it is both unfair and unscientific. Either the railroads will be overpaid or they will be underpaid; the Government will necessarily pay either too much or too little, for the evident reason that if space is taken as the determining factor and fixed as a constant measure, without respect to weight, we will have a service which varies but which is measured by compensation which is fixed. To illustrate, it is proposed to pay for the use or rent of the railroad mail car the theoretical average earning of a passenger car. Now, if the actual load under this proposed plan is less than the average earning of the passenger car, the railroad will be paid too much; if, on the other hand, the actual load is more than this average, the railroad will not be paid enough. Averages are always ascertained as a statistical result of business for a given period and are not, therefore, and never can be, properly used as a basis of compensation, nor as the basis for the selling price of any commodity.

Let us consider for a moment just what this change to a space basis of mail pay really does. It is not simply a proposal to compel the railroads of the country to carry the United States mail and the parcel post, although this bill does require compulsory service. The plain purpose of this bill is to compel the railroads to rent to the Post Office Department the cars which they have built to enable themselves to engage in the transportation business, and, worst of all, not for private governmental use but to enable the Post Office Department to use these cars, after renting them, in active competition with the railroads themselves in the transportation of commercial freight. If that is a fair statement of the proposition, is there any wonder that the railroads of the country should feel that they have a just grievance and that they are opposed to the space basis? The opposition is not confined to one road, but embraces every road in the country. It is not only the great systems, but the smallest and the weakest as well, that are opposing this radical change. As a matter of simple justice, should Congress, which has established the parcel post, now go so far as to compel the carriers to give up their own facilities for competition against themselves? It seems to me that the proposition at its very best is revolutionary in the extreme, besides being wholly experimental in the field of transportation principles and practice.

Every Member of this House knows that weight is the universal basis for transporting objects, because that method is a safe and sound gauge of the very thing which the transportation agency must carry; it is the very basis which the Post Office Department itself employs in making its own charge to the people for transporting their mails, even to a letter, postal card, package, or newspaper; and it is the basis which the carrier would, of course, employ without question if it were a direct agancy of the public instead of a subagency in the transportation of mail.

If I understand this matter correctly, the "space" basis means, further, that the opinion of postal officers would supersede the accuracy of the scale as the gauge of pay. One would suppose that the space needed would be readily determined by the amount of mail which could be stored in a given space, and while it is true that after a given amount of space is loaded no injury perhaps would result to the carrier if paid for that space, provided an adequate and just rate could be ascertained and applied, yet the greatest danger from a space basis, depending upon the opinion of an individual, is that the Postmaster General and the officers of the Post Office Department, scattered all over the country and in control of railway mail transportation, can without limit and without measure pay for space as they see fit. It seems to me that the Government, even more than the railroads, should oppose a space basis, for in the adoption of that basis there lies a most dangerous power of abuse for personal or political advantage or for favoritism to any railroad company. If I interpret this bill correctly, the Postmaster General would have the authority to pay for a 30-foot car instead of a 15-foot car, simply because he desired to do so. The difference would not depend on the number of post offices to be served or on the weight or size of the mail itself, but would resolve itself simply into a question as to whether he willed to do so. I do not wish to be understood as impugning the integrity of the present postal officials nor of the officers of the railroads, but it must be plain that such a plan, giving such wide latitude to the Postmaster General, makes possible, and easily possible, the opportunity for collusion that might permit raids upon the Treasury of the United States. While I believe that our postal affairs are being honestly administered to-day, yet the public has not forgotten that there have been scandals in that department in the past. We all recall the startling revelations resulting from an investigation of the star-route frauds of several decades ago. In view of what has occurred, it seems to me that it is incumbent upon Congress to safeguard the interests of the public against any possible future frauds.

I believe that the proposed change is not only unfair, but that it is impracticable and unadapted to the service of transportation of the mail. I regard it as utterly impossible in a country such as this, with 225,000 miles of railroad, and with territory 3,000 miles distant from Washington, for the Post Office Department to authorize in advance for the payment of the space needed on every train throughout the whole country every day; because no man can know, unless he is right at the train when it starts, how much space the mail will require.

This bill names rates for transportation per car-mile and for terminal service, but it strikes me that this is of little value in determining what compensation the railroad companies would receive. They are not fixed rates. They are entirely discretionary, because they are qualified by the term "not exceeding," which gives the Postmaster General the absolute power to make any rate he may desire.

Mr. MOON. May I ask the gentleman if that is not the law now on the weight question?

Mr. RODENBERG. I understand it is fixed and definite.

Mr. MOON. It has never been any other way and could not be.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit——

Mr. RODENBERG. I can not permit an interruption, as I have only 15 minutes, and I will not be able to finish what I have to say within that time. I am very sorry I can not yield.

I submit that this is contrary to every principle of rates which apply to common carriers, because these rates must be definite, fixed, and certain. When the carriers are compelled by the exercise of the great, sovereign power of the Government to carry the mail—and they have no option in the premises—the question of delegating the rate-making power to the Postmaster General should not be considered. The rates should not only be adequate, but they should also be fixed and certain, and not dependent upon the whim or caprice of any official.

The bill empowers the Postmaster General to pay for any amount of baggage-car space he may want. While this space is classified as storage-car space and the maximum rate stated for such a car, he is permitted to require any amount from 1 foot to 60 feet of the car, and it is easily conceivable that in a practical service he may therefore require the railroad company to have an entire car, 60 feet in length, in order to furnish the space he may demand and yet pay only for a fractional part of it. A railroad can not haul independently 5 feet, 10 feet, or 30 feet of space, because it is limited in its transportation business to the haul of the unit, which, of course, is a car.

While the bill purports to provide compensation for the transportation service on trains, it also specifically requires the railroads of the country to carry the mails between all post offices on their lines and their stations regardless of distances. However, this is qualified by a provision theoretically giving the discretion as to when and where this will be applied or required, but the discretion here can only be exercised to discriminate in favor of one railroad, at one place, as compared with another railroad, because if such a requirement should exist at all, it should be uniformly applied, as there are no conditions of service to justify a discrimination. Not only is this service not a proper and ordinary or customary function of a railroad, because its service should be limited to transportation and handling of business or its own property, but it does not carry freight or passengers or other business or express beyond those stations. This bill, in this particular, requires a service for which there is no pretense that there is any compensation provided.

Railroad companies now carry mail between stations and post offices where they are within the 80-rod limit, but it is on a different basis of rates. This service is performed because the present rates contemplate, theoretically at least, that compensation for this service is included. In the bill now before us we have a separate and distinct provision for transportation service itself, and in addition we have this requirement without any theory that it is paid for. Those of us who believe that the railroads of the country have been unjustly treated in the matter of mail compensation and that that compensation has not been increased in proportion to the increase in the service that the railroads have been compelled to render since the inauguration and development of parcel post are told that this bill will increase the compensation of the railroads. In his very able address of last Tuesday in advocacy of this bill the distinguished chairman [Mr. MOON], for whom I entertain the highest regard and whose candor I have always admired, made the statement that under the provisions of this new bill the railroads would receive nearly $4,000,000 more than they have ever gotten under any bill.

This statement of the chairman, however, was contradicted a moment ago by the gentleman who just preceded me [Mr. LLOYD]. The gentleman, who is also somewhat of an expert in postal matters, has just stated that in his opinion the railroads would not receive any additional compensation as a result of this legislation, but that their compensation would be the same as it was last year.

While I admit that the bill presents a specious appearance of increasing the revenue of the railroads, I believe the actual purpose of the department is to decrease and not to add to the compensation of the railroads.

In his speech in the House of Representatives on December 19, 1914, the distinguished chairman, in explaining the real purposes of the bill then under consideration, made the following statement in a colloquy with Mr. PAGE of North Carolina:

> It does not show a saving upon its face, and can not do it, but only shows an administrative proposition of saving. The saving will occur, as the department thinks, in the handling of the mails. In other words, you have changed from the quadrennial weighing of the mails on a weight basis, on which the pay is to be computed, to the space provision, and you will have enough space under the contract to carry all your parcel post, probably without any additional compensation, and save many millions annually. That is their theory.

On the same day, in another colloquy with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], the distinguished chairman asked this question:

> Does not the gentleman know that the main feature of this bill, the only great feature in it, is a railroad proposition, and does he not know that when he voted as he did he voted against the consideration of that railroad proposition, that would save this country $8,000,000 every year if carried?

Thus the present bill, while on its face purporting to grant the possibility of a $4,000,000 increase to the railroads, provided the Postmaster General exercises a beneficent discretion, in reality contemplates that by having the railroads haul the parcel post without additional compensation the Government will save $8,000,000 annually and pay the railroads that much less. This admission, frankly made by the chairman in 1914, is just as pertinent to-day as it was then. Is there any wonder, therefore, that every railroad in the United States is opposing a scheme with such an admitted purpose? I believe that the Postmaster General is more deeply concerned over the question of preventing a deficit in his department than he is about the efficiency of the service or the payment of adequate compensation to the common carriers.

I am opposed to changing to a space basis, because I regard it as unwise and unnecessary to make such a revolutionary change in the system of pay when it is evident that the existing method of weight basis has not been against the Government's interests, and when only a few amendments are needed to correct any inadequacy in the existing system about which there may be any complaint.

Annual weighings, of course, cost a great deal of money; but this is a detail which can be fairly distributed by the Government, as the railroads have indicated their disposition to accept whatever terms may be offered as reasonable.

All of the experience of 40 years that has been gained in the administrative details of the present law, and all of the precedents arising therefrom, would be destroyed by this new method, using the space basis, and introducing complexities greater than at present, creating increased administrative difficulties, due to the difference of opinion as to space needed or used in comparison with the space authorized by the department. I regard this proposed change as economically unsound and unsafe, because it ignores the principal factor of service rendered, namely, the conveyance of the mails, and substitutes therefor the transportation receptacle or instrumentality through which the mails are transported. The intrinsic service rendered by the carriers, that is to say the amount of mail conveyed, would not be shown specifically. The estimates would necessarily rest not on the weight of the mail to be transported but on the opinion of the local officials as to the space needed. It would thus be not only difficult to check against extravagant or discriminating allotments, but equally as difficult to make estimates by appropriations which might appear to be extravagant, while in reality barely moderate in amount. All postage rates are based on the weight of the article to be transported, and it is therefore harmonious and consistent that the transportation rates should also be based upon the amount of freight carried and the distance that it is conveyed.

I can not help but feel that the department, by having the words "not exceeding" inserted, intends that the amounts allowed, which may be paid, shall be subject to diminution in the future. If the department intends, as has been suggested, to pay the maximum rates permitted, why do they insist that their discretion should be allowed full scope, so that they may pay less and can not pay "exceeding"? And why, if it is the intention of the department to pay the maximum rates, has that same department advised the chairman that a saving of many millions of dollars will result? It occurs to me that while the railroads could be paid increased revenues under this bill the department has no intention of doing so. It seems to me that the Postmaster General intends to work out his plan so as to pay the railroads less and to have all the parcel post handled without any compensation, as was frankly stated by the chairman when a similar bill was under consideration in the preceding Congress.

I regard it as unwise to establish a fixed measure for mail pay without first asking the advice of our great expert transportation body, the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is now proposed to establish a space basis as a measure for payment. The Interstate Commerce Commission has never been consulted, nor has it ever been asked whether the railroads should be paid for handling the mail upon a space or weight basis. Before the adequacy or inadequacy of the rate is determined, and before any change is made, we should ask and obtain from the Interstate Commerce Commission their opinion as experts, whether the yardstick should be space or weight. It is now proposed to artificially manufacture the yardstick, and then to ask the expert body how the yardstick should be applied. In reasonableness and justice we should first obtain from the experts the method of their measurement before we start out to measure. This bill proposes to submit to the Interstate Commerce Commission the adequacy or inadequacy of payments; but this adequacy or inadequacy will be determined by an arbitrary method fixed in advance without the advice of the expert body as to how the method should be arrived at, and it is a method which is inconsistent with every principle upon which the Interstate Commerce Commission has either fixed or approved every other transportation rate.

In innumerable decisions the Interstate Commerce Commission has determined the adequacy of a rate by the weight, the value and the cost of handling a particular commodity. It is now proposed to discard these recognized principles and to set up an altogether different standard. Without professing any intimate knowledge of this matter, and without reflecting in any way upon the earnest efforts of the distinguished chairman and the members of the committee to correctly determine the standard for the fixation of mail pay, I regard it as most unwise, and even dangerous, to force the acceptance of a fixed standard of measurement in rider legislation. It seems to me that a matter of such great importance as this should be calmly considered and studied by each Member of this body in a separate bill and as a distinct proposition. We could then determine for ourselves just how we should act, and we would not be compelled to accept, as this present situation demands, the judgment of the committee rather than our own within the brief time allotted for consideration. The method of fixing pay should not be considered by the House until we have obtained the opinion of the expert body upon transportation questions—the Interstate Commerce Commission. And the question should then be considered as a separate proposition and not as a part of a complex whole, as a portion of a bill which contains so many other subjects and purposes and covers so many other difficult propositions.

There is another feature of this proposed bill which I regard as most serious. The bill requires service to be performed by the railroads without regard to the reasonableness or adequacy of the compensation, and this requirement subjects it to the grave criticism that it may be declared unconstitutional and void by the courts. The Supreme Court of the United States on March 8, 1915, in the case of Norfolk & Western against State of West Virginia, and in the case decided on March 8, 1915, Northern Pacific Railway Co. against State of North Dakota, held that no law was constitutional which proposes to fix an unremunerative rate upon any particular commodity or service. This bill plainly permits arbitrary fixations, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, and does not limit that jurisdiction to what is a fair rate, reasonable, just, or adequate.

The Interstate Commerce Commission has held that the present passenger rates are not adequate. The basis of payment for space as provided for in this bill is predicated upon the average earnings of a passenger car, declared by the Interstate Commerce Commission to be insufficient. It is manifest, therefore, that even if the maximum rates be paid for hauling a mail car, the compensation will be inadequate. In other words, the bill on its face purports to require service with an inadequate compensation to the railroads. The bill does not provide that the compensation shall be adequate, and therefore it is subject to the criticism that a service may be required for an inadequate, unreasonable rate, thus violating a constitutional guarantee as laid down in these decisions of the Supreme Court.

It seems to me that it would be most unwise for us at this time to inject into the mail pay question a proposition which will, in all human probability be followed by a great amount of litigation and which will drag through the courts for years in order that the validity of the law may be determined, and, in the meantime, confusion will grow and uncertainty increase.

This bill provides that the railroads should perform services at rates to be fixed in the discretion of the Postmaster General at not exceeding a certain maxima. The railroads would be compelled under this law to perform such service if the Postmaster General, in his discretion, fixed rates greatly less than the maxima allowed by law, as the railroads must perform the service whether the rates be reasonable or compensatory or otherwise.

Even if the Postmaster General should fix rates that are plainly confiscatory, still, under this law, the service must be performed, or the railroad will be subjected to a large penalty. Such legislation, it seems to me, contravenes the Constitution, which provides that no property shall be taken, and no service required to be performed save for an adequate consideration.

Another objection is that under the proposed space basis, the Government in effect undertakes to enter the field of commercial freight transportation, and becomes a competitor of the railroads. By fixing its own rates the Government is thus enabled to haul freight at lower rates than those fixed for the railroads by the Interstate Commerce Commission. In other words, the railroads must haul freight at rates fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the railroads under this proposed law, would be compelled by the Government to haul the same kind of freight for less rates, which have been fixed by the Government itself.

Thus, the Government, in the guise of a shipper, will fix its own rates, whereas the Interstate Commerce Commission fixes the rates for all the other shippers. The Government would be enabled to give itself a privilege and discriminate in favor of itself and against all other shippers of commodities. It strikes me as being fundamentally sound and just that if the Government intends to go into the transportation business and ship the same kind of commodities; that is, commercial freight, as is now handled by the railroads, the Government rates should also be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is the rate-making body.

In order to meet this situation and in recognition of the Government as a competitor, with other shippers, the hearings before the committee show that the railroads are willing, and, in fact, have proposed that the Interstate Commerce Commission fix the rates for the transportation of mail, so that the rate-making body will determine for the Government as a shipper and the railroads as a carrier, what the shipper should pay and what the railroads should receive.

To-day all shippers, including the Government, pay upon the weight basis. If this bill becomes a law the Government will pay upon the space basis, which is an entirely different method of payment from that employed by the commission in fixing the rates for serving the public. Inasmuch as we have a great rate-making body, which fixes the rates upon all commodities, why is it not fair and just, and why should the Government complain if its own instrumentality, the Interstate Commerce Commission, fix for it as a shipper and the railroads as a carrier the rates for which service is to be performed and payments made? The railroads have signified their willingness to submit this whole question to the Interstate Commerce Commission and to abide the result, and if the Government intends to be fair, and wants to be fair, why should it object to permitting the Interstate Commerce Commission to settle this question, which is so peculiarly within its jurisdiction?

In setting forth my objections to the pending measure, I do not wish to be understood as reflecting in any way on the honesty of purpose of the very excellent gentlemen who constitute the great Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I believe that they are thoroughly conscientious in their recommendations to this House, but my sense of fairness and right will not permit me to harmonize my views with theirs on this very important question. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I just want to observe, in view of the remark the gentleman has made, that the rates of compensation are entirely different in this bill from the one considered two years ago, and even one item in this bill, that of terminal charges, allows an increase of compensation of $1,900,000. But it is not necessary again for me to discuss that matter, as other gentlemen desire to discuss it. The gentleman proceeded upon an entirely false theory, and, with all due respect to him, I must say, an entire misunderstanding of the meaning of the bill. For instance, he said we could take a 60-foot car and pay for but 1 foot in it if we wanted to do so, and use the whole car. We do not get the benefit of the 60 feet if we only pay for 1 foot. We then use 1 foot and the companies have the other 59 feet for their baggage and transportation. That is just a specimen of the statement of the gentleman showing the utter misunderstanding of this measure.

But, Mr. Chairman, I did not rise to discuss the matter but to yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, the Postal Service is the most popular department of the Government service. It comes in closest contact with the people. They believe in it, and eagerly avail themselves of every opportunity to extend the scope of its usefulness. City delivery, rural delivery, parcel post, postal savings banks, everything, once established, have come to stay. To curtail or discontinue any part of this public service would awaken such pronounced opposition on the part of the people as to be not misunderstood. Likewise, the people have welcomed every innovation that was calculated to improve the working conditions of the postal employees, even though such change might offer a temporary inconvenience to themselves. Sunday closing was approvingly welcomed by the people throughout the country, without division of sentiment, as was also the recognition of the holidays by the Post Office. The eight-hour day found its earliest application by Congress to the Postal Service, as did annual vacation periods.

The temper of the people in their attitude toward the Postal Service is so plain as to be not mistaken. They desire to make it a model service, both as to the efficiency of its methods and the treatment of its employees. The people expect it to point the way. They want it to lead. Nor do they complain of the cost. To be an example for employment in civil industry to emulate, the people have enthusiastically indorsed every change that would operate to make the Postal Service an inspiring example for the general good of the country. As a matter of fact, in one essential particular the Postal Service is lagging painfully behind. This is in the manner in which it treats its aged employees. It has no plan whatsoever to meet this problem. What it really does is indefensible. On one pretext or another the old men in the Postal Service are penalized or discharged for no other reason than the fact that they have grown old. They are let go outright, dismissed at the expiration of 150 days, or reduced in salary for no other cause than their age. The old men are plainly shown that they are not wanted. To show just how he is treated, and the utter absence of any settled provision for his protection, I quote the following language from a recent paper by First Assistant Postmaster General Roper:

The result is that tenure of office in the Government service does not now depend on the law or on the uniform needs of the service but upon the varying temperaments of supervisory officers and their varying conceptions of their public duty. Especially is this true in the Postal Service, because of the wide discretion accorded to postmasters in the conduct of their offices.

Could any plan be worse? Contrast this absence of system with the manner in which this problem is faced by private corporations. It is unthinkable that it shall continue. Such a policy is neither wise nor just, and it can by no means be considered economical. It is not in keeping with public opinion on the general subject of superannuation, and it places the Post Office Department lamentably behind private corporations in their manner of dealing with this problem.

Without any hesitation we should meet this question of superannuation in the Postal Service in the only way that it can be successfully met, and that is by providing pensions for its aged employees. In doing so, the Postal Service will be improved as never before; the public will earnestly applaud this legislation, and simple justice will be done a capable body of faithful and deserving employees.

Mr. Chairman, I have long been interested in this very important subject, and early in January I introduced a bill, H. R. 6915, which would provide for the retirement from the service of these superannuated employees, together with an allowance of $600 per annum. My bill applies to city and rural carriers, post-office clerks and other employees in post offices, and to railway mail clerks. This bill is now pending before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and I am encouraged to believe that the Post Office Committee is disposed to earnestly investigate this question of superannuation in the Postal Service. When the time comes it will be demonstrated to the Post Office Committee and to the membership of this House that it will not cost much more than $300,000 to enable the Government not only to settle the vexing problem of superannuation in the Postal Service but also to grant much-needed relief to the veterans of the service who have grown gray and feeble through the many years of faithful and devoted service. The bill is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6915) granting indefinite leaves of absence to superannuated employees of the Postal Service.

Be it enacted, etc., That, beginning with the 1st day of July next following the passage of this act, the Postmaster General shall grant an indefinite leave of absence, together with an allowance of $600 per annum, to be payable monthly, to any person employed in the Railway Mail Service, the Rural Free Delivery Service, the City Free Delivery Service, and to post-office clerks and other employees in post-offices who are in the classified civil service who have become incapacitated from performing their duties through superannuation.

SEC. 2. That should it be found necessary to employ a substitute to fill the place of an employee who has been granted an indefinite leave of absence, said substitute shall be paid at the rate allowed for vacation work: Provided, That such assignment shall not interfere with the promotion of the stubstitute to appointment on the regular force when a vancancy occurs or when the force is increased and when said substitute is eligible for such regular appointment by virtue of his standing on the substitute list.

SEC. 3. That the Postmaster General shall establish boards of retirement, each board to consist of not less than three members, to be selected from employees of the Post Office Department and the Postal Service, who shall serve without extra compensation, whose duty it shall be to examine all applications for the granting of such indefinite leaves of absence and to make recommendations based upon their findings to the Postmaster General for his guidance: Provided, That the Postmaster General shall have authority to appoint a physician to advise each board in making its recommendations.

SEC. 4. That applications for the granting of indefinite leave of absence may be either voluntary on the part of the employee or may be recommended by the proper administrative or supervisory official.

SEC. 5. That the Postmaster General shall immediately formulate and issue such rules and regulations as in his judgment may be best calculated to carry out the purpose of this act.

Mr. Miles M. Dawson, a member of the New York bar, a former associate of United States Supreme Court Justice Charles E. Hughes in the insurance investigations of New York State, the present associate counsel of Mr. Bainbridge Coby, the attorney for the Thompson investigation committee in New York, and one of the best-known consulting actuaries in America, has submitted the following report on H. R. 6915:

[Special report upon the probable cost of allowances to postal employees of the United States Government, incapacitated by superannuation, under the provisions of S. 3081, H. R. 6915. Given at New York this 24th day of January, 1916, to the National Association of Letter Carriers.]

This bill, introduced by Senator PENROSE in the Senate and by Representative GRIFFIN in the House, provides "for an indefinite leave of absence, together with an allowance of $600 per annum, to be payable monthly, to any person employed in the Railway Mail Service, the Free Delivery Service, the City Free Delivery Service, and to post-office clerks and other employees in post offices who are in the classified civil service, who have become incapacitated from performing their duties through superannuation."

For the purpose of computing the expense involved in making these allowances I have assumed that all who were in the service in 1907 and who are now living are still in the service and may become eligible for this allowance. For the rate of becoming incapacitated I have made use of Mead's table, deduced from the experience of the Knights of the Maccabees, which experience is used by life insurance companies in the computation of rates and reserves for insurance against incapacity, and is regarded safe and reliable.

On this basis I compute the cost for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1916, at $362,250, equal to about three-tenths of 1 per cent of the salaries; for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1921, $1,147,800, equal to about ninety-five one-hundredths of 1 per cent of the salaries; and for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1926, $2,125,800, equal to about 1¾ per cent of the salaries.

If these allowances were to be provided by the contribution by the employees of a percentage of their salaries, a larger contribution than 1 per cent of the salaries would not be required, upon the basis of the foregoing computations, until after the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1921. Such contributions would need to be supplemented, however, after the expiration of such fiscal year, by appropriations to cover the excess, which appropriations would, on the basis of the foregoing computations, rise to an amount equal to three-fourths of 1 per cent of the salaries by the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1926.

This method of providing for actual incapacity will be much more economical, and is, in my opinion, much more likely to be acceptable to the voters, to Congress, and to the employees than a plan which would so retire every employee upon reaching a certain age, even though he was in fact not incapacitated, but was, instead, able to give full service.

Respectfully submitted.

MILES M. DAWSON, F. I. A., F. A. S., Consulting Actuary.

Grave, indeed, must be the reasons that at any time or in any industry justify a reduction in wages. Too far-reaching is the effect of such a policy to permit it to be approached lightly. Not only does it leave the men affected discontented and sullen but it awakens a feeling of apprehension among fellow employees. Standards of living are reduced, business is upset, and if such reduction is widely extended the very prosperity of the country itself is threatened.

Disquieting enough is a wage reduction in civil industry, but when the Government, through its administrative officers, begin to cut wages in any of its departments, it awakens a feeling of alarm among all the people, leaving a trail of evil consequences in its wake. If the Government which, unlike a private corporation, is not called upon to face rigid competition nor has to the same extent the motive of profit as the basis of its existence—if such an institution is compelled to reduce salaries and invite the suffering which must follow such an act, what, then, must be the natural effect such a policy will have upon the minds of the people in general? There is but one conclusion to which they will come and that is that the country is facing some serious business depression.

The past year has seen just such a reduction in wages, and that, too, among employees of the Government. Nor was there any sound reason for this reduction. No condition had arisen in the economic life of our people which warranted such drastic action or justified this wholesale retrenchment policy, which was particularly put in operation by the Post Office Department during this administration.

I desire to speak upon one particular phase of this subject in reference to a reduction in wage of the postal employees. So glaringly and palpably inexcusable is this case to which your attention is directed that I am confident no sane man can view it in any other light, after he has reviewed the facts, than one of most emphatic disapproval.

The classification act, approved March 2, 1907, is a law passed by Congress, fixing the salary of clerks and city letter carriers employed in the post offices throughout the country. This law provides for a maximum salary of $1,200 per annum for such employees, which is attained after a certain period of service. Under the provisions of this act, whose construction and application no one had ever questioned, faithful employees, without discrimination, advanced in regular order to its highest grade, which permitted them to receive the maximum salary of $1,200 per year. Without warning and without any approval from this body, the construction and purpose of this act fixing salaries of postal employees was changed, and that altogether by departmental regulation.

Under date of February 4, 1915, a circular letter signed by First Assistant Postmaster General Roper was mailed to the postmasters of the country, containing the following order:

The work of carriers collecting is less exacting and important than that performed by carriers in effecting deliveries of mail. It is therefore desired that in the future the maximum salary of letter carriers assigned to the collection of mail be fixed at $1,000 per annum. You will proceed in accordance with this policy to make the necessary assignments of the higher salaried carriers to delivery work, and you will not in the future give to any letter carrier receiving a salary in excess of $1,000 an assignment as collector.

The effect of this order created consternation among the employees. They could read between the lines, despite its ingenuous wording, that it was simply a reduction in salary. The Post Office Department, by this order, had seen fit to create another grade of letter carriers and assign to them a salary $200 less per annum than had heretofore been paid for the same work. If the department could so create grades and so fix salaries, without authority from Congress, then no employee or no salary could be considered safe. The public, too, let it be added, roundly condemned this order, and protests against its enforcement flowed in broad volume down to Members of Congress.

In its application the effect of this order was not only to awaken alarm among the employees, but also to reduce the efficiency of the service. The collection service of the post office had never been considered an easy berth. In fact, it was a position of which most employees fought shy. Usually such employees furnish their own equipment especially designed for collecting mail, under contract with the Post Office Department. Other employees had been assigned to the collection service over their protest, and yet after a period of years, unable to effect a transfer to the delivery service, had resigned themselves to their present station. Still other carriers in the collection service, by virtue of long absence from delivery service, had lost intimate touch which they formerly enjoyed with this branch of postal work.

These men and others similarly situated were suddenly called upon to fill a position in the delivery service assigned to letter carriers or be compelled to suffer a reduction of $200 in their annual salary. It was generally understood that if these men could qualify in the delivery service they would be permitted to retain their present salary, but as a matter of fact the manner and means by which such opportunity was tendered them almost made its acceptance prohibitive. Indicating their willingness to take a delivery route quite often heavy and complicated territory was assigned them. Then again three days was allotted these employees in which to familiarize themselves with their new district. Furthermore they must withstand a test for speed and accuracy for handling mail both in and out of the office, which to men long absent from former duties was wellnigh impossible. Failing to maintain in their new station the same high standard of speed that even men regularly assigned to such work held up with difficulty, they were adjudged incompetent. Thus many men fearing to be further penalized voluntarily petitioned to be returned to their old positions. Others were plainly told that they could not keep up the pace. The final result was just the one originally intended when the order was promulgated by the department—a reduction of the wage of letter carriers.

Then again many employees owning their own equipment used in the collection service, representing an investment of from $400 to $500, found no purchaser for this equipment in case they abandoned their present position to accept a position as carrier in delivery service. Whichever way these men turned they faced a loss. There was no escape from it.

Pressed for a reason to explain or justify this enforced loss of wages for so many deserving employees, the department again insisted that "the work of carriers assigned to the collection service is less important and exacting than that performed by carriers in effecting deliveries of mail." Let us see just how trying and important are the duties of carriers assigned to the collection service and to further ascertain whether Congress acted with wisdom in fixing the present salary for these men which they should now really enjoy.

Carriers assigned to the collection service are employed the same number of hours as other employees in the Postal Service. Their schedules are so arranged that they work every minute of their eight hours. Routes are so arranged, letter boxes must be reached on almost the exact minute, and the high continuous speed must be so maintained that not one minute in their day's labor but must be accounted for. Carrying hundreds of pounds of most valuable and important business mail, often making hotel deliveries and carrying important parcels en route, this work calls for a regularity and reliability of service that demands the most faithful and trusted sort of an employee.

Then, too, the work is most arduous and trying. Constantly maintaining a hurried speed, working always where crowds and traffic are most congested, unceasingly alert to avoid accident, burdened with heavy loads, careful to protect the valuable and important charge with which they are intrusted, these employees are one of the most necessary and indispensable factors in the great postal organization. To assert that these positions are other than trusted and responsible is a statement that is absolutely and unqualifiedly untrue.

Moreover, the application of the order of February 4, 1915, resulted in another change in the service which did not, to say the least, make for its added efficiency. Older men were transferred from collection service to delivery service and the young and active men were in turn assigned to the collection service. Thus in effect the very spirit and purpose which the department alleges was responsible for the issuance of this order was in fact largely defeated by the very operation of the order itself.

To further prove to you in what high estimation the position of collector is held, I have here in my hand an order issued by the Chicago post office instructing such employees in the proper performance of their duties. This order is entitled "General rules for the government of collectors," and in all there are 78 regulations of discipline which these employees must observe, and I insert it as part of my remarks and for the information of the Members of this body. Quite an imposing list, I would say, for a position that is considered unimportant.

[Circular No. 61. Post office, Chicago, Ill., delivery division.]

GENERAL RULES FOR THE GOVERNMENT OF COLLECTORS.

DONT'S.

Don't solicit contributions from the public.
Don't smoke while on duty.
Don't carry your satchel in a way to endanger its contents.
Don't remove stamps from mail matter.
Don't fold photographs, pictures, calendars, and like articles.
Don't fill out your trip reports except as time is made during the day.
Don't exhibit mail matter to anyone.
Don't receive money to pay postage on letters handed you for mailing or receive the letters unless stamped.
Don't stop for meals while on your trips.
Don't engage in any business not connected with this service during your working hours.
Don't injure, deface, mutilate, or destroy any furniture or property of the Government or of contractor.
Don't make overtime.
Don't expand your actual time.
Don't do anything either in the office or out of it that will bring discredit on the service.
Don't contract debts which you have no reasonable prospect of paying.
Don't enter a saloon in uniform when on or off duty.

MUSTS.

Collectors—
Must accept instructions from and give desired information to properly accredited post-office inspectors.
Must make prompt report of letter-box locks or keys found in bad order.
Must specify the nature of trouble when reporting boxes out of order.
Must not put oil or grease in locks.
Must, in season provide themselves with small cans of alcohol to thaw frozen locks.
Must not expose letter-box keys to the public.
Must keep letter-box keys securely fastened through two rings to chains, which must be attached to their persons.
Must make prompt report of the loss of letter-box key or lock.
Must not attempt to alter or repair a letter-box key.
Must not continue to use a letter-box key that is cracked, even slightly, but should get a new one.
Must report defective time cards.
Must not permit time cards to remain on boxes which show collections at variance with existing schedule.
Must not deviate from prescribed routes without leave. When necessary to do so the departure must be reported.
Must not stop to talk or loiter on duty.
Must give preference to first-class mail when all the contents of boxes on the routes can not be taken.
Must make report of mail left uncollected, specifying trip.
Must not omit collections from boxes on the routes.
Must make a thorough examination of the interior of boxes when emptying them.
Must leave no mail in boxes.
Must examine the tops of boxes and collect mail found thereon.
Must accept letters and other small articles handed them for mailing when postage has been prepaid, but must not delay their collections by waiting for such mail.
Must not return to any person letters deposited in letter boxes.
Must refer all persons making request for such letters to inquiry division, post office.
Must exercise great care in emptying sacks, so that no mail will be left therein.
Must examine all sacks received from post office, stations, relieving wagons, and mail cars, as also sacks left in their wagons at end of duty.
Must report mail found in supposed empty sacks, giving the addresses and business cards on at least three of the articles found; also giving hour and date when found.
Must not sit down on sack or read newspapers when waiting for relieving wagon or mail car.
Must make Sunday and holiday collections complete under all circumstances.
Must keep in their possession an up-to-date list of boxes on route—also schedule showing time of collections of each box—for use of substitutes.
Must not encourage or advise the public to place mail on or under boxes.
Must not lend collector's satchels or tie sacks to the public.
Must not store wearing apparel, umbrellas, lunches, or personal property of any kind in letter boxes.
Must not leave mail in wagon unguarded.
Must exercise proper care in the use of their equipment—horses, wagons, harness, etc.
Must not turn out of street-car tracks with horse moving on a trot.
Must not drive with a loose rein. If the reins are drawn up taut a driver can frequently save a horse from falling when it stumbles, preventing the breaking of shafts and harness.
Must not leave their horses without securing them by weight or hitching strap.
Must not face mail or engage in anything that will take attention from the horse when driving.
Must not jump out of wagon before stopping the horse with the reins.
Must not cross tracks immediately in front of approaching trains or cars.

Must not allow unauthorized persons to ride in wagons.
Must not make alterations in equipment without consent of contractor.
Must keep lamp supplied with candle and light up at dark.
Must face first-class mail and circulars at end of trip.
Must travel at an even speed over the routes, at a rate that will complete the trip not to exceed five minutes before time is set for the end.
Must not use United States mail bags and satchels for any other purpose than for carrying mail.
Must record actual time on time records regardless of schedules.
Must not permit the delivery of parcel-post mail to interfere with collections except upon the trips set aside for parcel-post delivery.
Must not curtail the collections on these parcel-post trips any more than is required to effect delivery of the parcel-post matter.
Must record upon time card the number of boxes collected on these parcel-post trips.
Must mail time card daily at end of duty.
Must keep uniform in a neat and clean condition.
Must always appear in full uniform when on duty.
Must report all incidents which interfere with the full performance of work within schedule time.
Must report all matters that come to their knowledge pertaining to the service that should be known to this office.
Collectors who pouch mail for dispatch on steam railroads must see to it that pouches are securely locked and labeled, label to bear date and name of collector.
When two or more pouches are dispatched the labels must be numbered serially, the number on the last pouch to be followed by an "X." When but one pouch is dispatched no number must appear on the label.
If letter or package box is found unlocked, the collector making last previous collection will be held responsible.
It is the duty of every collector to report defective boxes, posts, locks, time cards—in fact, all that might require the attention of this office, but the No. 1 man or day collector throughout the service is specially charged therewith and is held accountable.
A clerk is on duty in this office daily until midnight. When in trouble or uncertainty, use the telephone—Harrison, 4700.
It is a pernicious practice to carry mail from letter box to cart or wagon in hand. Collectors must always use a sack to make the transfer of mail from letter box to sack direct.

ACCIDENTS TO HORSES, EQUIPMENT, ETC.

A brief notation concerning accidents to horses and equipment, recounting the effect upon the service, must appear upon the collectors' time cards. Full and detailed report concerning same must be made to the superintendent of collections in addition thereto.
In case of accident by street or railway cars or collision of any kind, collectors shall secure the names of witnesses to the occurrence. This precautionary measure is necessary as a means of protecting the collector from an unfair charge of carelessness, and will also enable the equipment contractor to proceed against persons responsible for the accident.

ABSENCE FROM DUTY.

Collectors must not unnecessarily absent themselves from duty. When compelled to be absent because of their own illness or that of some member of their family, collectors must send word by messenger, by telephone, or otherwise, and at such time that the superintendent of the station will receive it before their term of duty begins. Should the absence on account of personal illness extend beyond one day, written application must be made for leave for as many days (not to exceed 30) as appears warranted. When absent more than three days on account of personal illness, the application for leave should be accompanied by a physician's certificate. If no physician is employed, satisfactory evidence of illness must be given in the form of a written statement of the facts.
Collectors desiring to be absent for any reason other than sickness are required to make previous application, using prescribed blank.

LE ROY T. STEWARD,
Superintendent, Delivery Division.

D. A. CAMPBELL, Postmaster.

JULY 15, 1915.

So self-evident to everyone who gave the subject a thought was the reduction in the salaries of these employees as an unjust and unwarranted action that Congress at the last session, alive to the complaints of the people and these employees, set about to rectify the wrong done. The Post Office appropriation bill providing for the needs of the Postal Service for the fiscal year 1915 failed of adoption during the last session of Congress. In its stead a joint resolution providing for the needs of the Postal Service was passed. This brief resolution was long enough, however, to contain the following specific provision for the protection of the interests and the preservation of the salaries of such letter carriers as are employed in the Postal Service of the country:

Provided, That letter carriers assigned to collection service who were promoted to the higher grades in accordance with the classification act, approved March 2, 1907, and whose salaries have been reduced during the past year through no delinquency or charge of misconduct on their part, shall be restored to their former grades.

This provision accurately reflects the temper of Congress on the question of reducing the wages of these employees. It seems impossible that any man or set of men could misunderstand what Congress, the lawmaking body of our Nation, intended should be done. They wanted no reduction in wages. They did not desire to create a new grade of letter carriers.

Yet, notwithstanding the directness of this mandate, the policy of establishing a maximum salary of $1,000 to be paid letter carriers assigned to the collection service is still continued by the Post Office Department.

Again, in an effort to have its wishes obeyed and to yield to these faithful carriers such equitable treatment as they are most justly entitled to, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has again inserted in the pending appropriation bill the following section:

That hereafter there shall be no distinction in salary made between letter carriers assigned to collection duty and letter carriers assigned to delivery duty: And provided further, That letter carriers whose salaries have been reduced as the result of any order of the Post Office Department making the maximum salary $1,000 to be paid letter carriers assigned to collection duty shall be restored to their former grades.

I am quite confident that the Members of this body are practically of one mind in the necessity and pressing need of the adoption of this measure. Its purpose can not and should not be misunderstood. It is a mandate of Congress, and the intent and spirit that prompted the framing of this provision should not be evaded or misinterpreted. These employees, who have had their salaries reduced through the operation of a departmental order, must have this same salary restored to them. That is the exact meaning of this measure. And, furthermore, let me add that in the present prosperous condition of this country, with every issue of our daily papers bearing the glad tidings to our people that employers in civil life in all lines of industry are voluntarily increasing the wages of their employees, at such a time it seems an absurdity beyond the comprehension of a reasonable mind why our Government or any of its departments should seek to take from as faithful, trusted, and reliable set of employees as ever graced the portals of any institution a part of their already ridiculously meager income.

Mr. Chairman, the Post Office Committee in making up the appropriation bill which is now pending gave earnest and careful consideration to the conditions of employment surrounding the vast army of postal employees.

We have incorporated in this bill a number of amendments calculated to not only remedy conditions in the service about which the employees have bitterly complained, but we have also adopted amendments granting additional benefits to these employees.
